Mixed results in Far East trip

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's jet age effort to open up "a golden window" for Israeli trade with the Far East was most successful in the Republic of Korea, less so in Japan and too brief to judge in China.

Analysis

The Koreans have an affinity for him personally and for Israel in general. One senior diplomat said the public here has been following his career with admiration since the days when as ambassador to the United Nations he stood up against all the Arab states except Egypt.

And Koreans see themselves as being in a situation similar to Israel's – constantly threatened by war and terrorism, dependent on foreign (in their case, American) troops to keep the peace and forced to use their ingenuity to make up for a lack of natural resources.

Netanyahu's theme, restated in all his speeches here, was that Israel's innovative talent combined with Korea's manufacturing and marketing ability was a natural marriage.

He used it in Japan, too, but with less dramatic results, as Japan is an economic superpower whose industrial inventiveness and technological know-how have generated a trillion-dollar economy. Their need for

Ottawa moves on suspect

TORONTO — The federal cabinet has stripped an alleged Nazi war criminal of his citizenship, paving the way for his deportation from Canada.

The minister-in-council last week removed the citizenship of Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary, a former officer in the Royal Hungarian Police, who allegedly had a position of authority in a ghetto and in a brickyard camp in Kassa, Hungary, now Kosice, Slovakia. Jews were transferred from the ghetto to the brickyard, where they lived in inhumane conditions. Those attempting to escape were shot. Csizsik-Csatary, 82, also allegedly transferred Jews to the Nazis for deportation to Auschwitz.

At first Csizsik-Csatary contested his loss of citizenship, but later withdrew his opposition. He can remain in Canada until federal authorities obtain a deportation order from the Federal Court of Canada.

Colon cancer gene found

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The discovery that a genetic mutation relatively common among Ashkenazi Jews makes them predisposed to colon cancer has prompted alarm – and the search for more information.

"We've been flooded with calls," said Jill Brensinger, a genetic counsellor at John Hopkins University's Hereditary Colorectal Cancer Registry in Baltimore.

Researchers at Hopkins found that a genetic defect which doubles a person's risk of colon cancer is present in about 360,000 American Jews, or six percent of the population, making it the most common cancer-causing mutation ever identified in an ethnic population.

Jews of Ashkenazi or Eastern European heritage comprise 95 percent of the more than five million Jews in the United States.

Colon cancer is the third most common type of cancer in the United States and will likely kill about 55,000 men and women this year.

The new finding raises questions about why so many genetic mutations are being found in the Ashkenazi Jewish population. It also raises questions about the value and risks of genetic testing, especially for a disease that is often preventable.

The discovery was made by a team of researchers at the Howard

JIAS Poster Contest

TORONTO — JIAS Canada will launch a national poster contest this month in honor of the organization's 75th anniversary. The theme of the contest is Life as a Jewish Immigrant in Canada and is open to childen in three age categories: 5-7; 8-11; and 12-15. The deadline for entries is Nov. 15.

For more information call Susan Helfenbaum at 416-630-9051, ext. 4; fax: 416-630-1376 or e-mail [briks@jon.cfny.org].

New CMA President

VICTORIA — Dr. Victor Dirnfeld, an internist from Richmond, B.C., has been chosen to be president of the Canadian Medical Association. A native of Winnipeg, Dr. Dirnfeld studied medicine at the University of Manitoba and obtained his medical degree in 1961.

ISRAEL

Bus Decision Opposed

JERUSALEM – An umbrella group representing Israeli women's organizations has petitioned the High Court of Justice to rescind a decision by the transportation minister to separate men and women on buses that serve Orthodox neighborhoods in Jerusalem and Bnei Brak.

The Israeli Women's Network said in its petition that the decision by Minister Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party was discriminatory and violates the right to freedom of movement.

Croatian Ties

JERUSALEM — Israel and Croatia have decided to open diplomatic ties. The Balkan president plans to visit Israel and apologize for his nation's persecution of Jews during World War II.

Foreign Ministry spokesperson Haim Koren said President Franjo Tudjman's visit to the Jewish state was crucial to the agreement.

Golan Dam Planned

JERUSALEM — Israel has decided to build a dam on territory claimed by Syria, a move that could further heighten tensions between the two countries.

The new dam site is one mile further upstream on the Yarmuk River than a site selected by the previous Labor government, according to Israeli officials.

In addition to threatening a further deterioration on the Israeli-Syrian track – the two sides have not held negotiations for more than a year – the decision to build the dam at the new site could embarrass Jordan.

The new site at El Hama, located at the foot of the Golan Heights, lies on land that is within Israel's recognized international boundaries. But it is inside the border that separated Israel and Syria before the 1967 Six Day War, and Syria has demanded a return to that border as a condition for signing a peace treaty with Israel.

WORLD

New Centre

MOSCOW — A new synagogue and community centre has opened for business in Central Asia.

Located in Almaty, the capital of the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan, the new building was dedicated this week, one year after ground-breaking.

It includes classrooms, a library, community offices, a mikvah and a soup kitchen to feed elderly and needy Jews.

Combatting Crime

MOSCOW — Israel and Russia have signed an agreement to broaden law enforcement cooperation.

The accord was recently signed during Israeli Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani's visit here.

Kahalani called the accord "historic."

JTS Appointment

NEW YORK — Prof. Alice Shalvi has been appointed to the position of rector of Jewish Theological Seminary's Jerusalem campus.

As rector of Beit Midrash, the formal name of the Jerusalem campus, Shalvi will oversee more than 300 graduate students enrolled in master's and doctoral programs in Jewish studies, rabbinics and Jewish education.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit photographs which relate to the theme Celebrating 100 Years of Zionism. They must be original photos "shot" by the reader.

Who can enter: Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Sept. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cheque for $100.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Sept. 19, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Oct. 2, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly thereafter.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Thornhill messianic group called 'deceptive'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN— A new messianic "synagogue" in the heart of Jewish Thornhill is a deceptive attempt to lure Jews to Christianity, warn Jews for Judaism and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

They charge that the City of David Messianic Synagogue is really a church out to target vulnerable Jews.

The congregation, which teaches that Jews should accept Jesus as their messiah, recently erected a large sign at its new premises, in a shopping plaza on the northwest corner of Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue. It shares a parking lot with several Jewish shops, a small Sephardi congregation and an office of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY).

There are several synagogues, day schools and Jewish institutions within a square-kilometre radius.

CJC says it's received a "rash" of complaints about the congregation, and has written the plaza's landlord.

In its letter to Mount-Batten Properties Ltd., Congress calls City of David "a Christian proselytizing group" whose establishment "in an area heavily populated by members of our community, many of whom are Holocaust survivors who have already suffered the indignity of being 'targeted,' is an affront to all Jews."

The messianic congregation has signed a six-year lease and has been operating in the space for about a month. Only recently did it put up the highly-visible signs, says its leader, Jeff Forman.

It's the first such congregation in York Region, said to be home to the fastest-growing Jewish community in Canada. It had been renting space at the Barbara Frum Library for nearly two years before coming to Thornhill, says Forman, 41, who describes himself as a "messianic rabbi."

Forman, who came to Canada from Philadelphia several years ago to head the congregation, told The CJN the basement space just underwent a $40,000 renovation, and can accommodate over 200 people.

At its recent opening, 175 people turned out. So far, there are Friday night services and Tuesday evening prayer sessions, which average about 60 people, Forman adds. There's no paid membership yet.

Forman says both Jews and non-Jews are welcome.

There's a main sanctuary, decked out in blue and white, and with an Israeli flag. A framed

Funding IN Action
UJA FEDERATION

Today Sharon Brooker can see her son, Todd, whenever she wants. It's a luxury they didn't always enjoy. For nearly 20 years, Todd, who has profound developmental disabilities, had been living in an Ottawa group home where Sharon could only visit him once or twice a month. But when the home was about to close because of government cutbacks, she didn't know where to turn. Thanks to Reena, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, Todd lives in Toronto in a caring group home that Sharon could only dream of.

QUALITY OF LIFE

"I knew about Reena because of their excellent reputation. What I didn't know was the extent of their capabilities and the wonderful facilities they provide for such severely disabled people," says Sharon.

Born three months premature and diagnosed with meningitis, Todd developed cerebral palsy and loss of sight. Now, with Todd living only a short drive away, Sharon is involved in every aspect of his life. "The best part is that I am able to do things with Todd - like giving him a hug. These are things that other people take for granted," notes Sharon.

QUALITY OF CARE

Sharon believes the caregivers set Reena apart from other organizations. With a staff of 3 full-time and a few part timers, it's easy for all 6 clients of the home to get the special and individual attention they require. "The staff are so compassionate and anxious to help in any way they can," says Sharon. "They expect a lot from Todd to get him to make the most of his life and to live up to his full potential. Today he is doing things that I never thought were possible."

A MOTHER'S JOY

"I'm just so grateful to have my son back here with me, and I thank Reena for bringing our family together," beams Sharon.

UJA Federation funds Jewish programming at Reena, which over the past 20 years, has created and maintained an environment that respects and promotes dignity, individuality and independence for the developmentally disabled. It's just another example of UJA Federation Funding in Action.

Carnage in Algeria ignored by the west

Periodically, the reports would appear in the newspapers. But they would be small articles, usually "briefs" in an international news roundup, almost inconspicuous by their length and their placement.

But their content is always grisly and ghastly.

The most recent of the reports appeared last week in the Globe and Mail.

"An armed group killed about 60 people in the mountain village of Beni Ali south of Algiers... 30 of them women. They cut off the heads of the people and put them in front of their doors..."

Two weeks earlier the Globe and Mail carried a similar though more comprehensive report.

"In a series of savage raids, Muslim rebels killed between 75 and 110 civilians in Algeria, cutting the throats of children and dragging off screaming girls, Algerian newspapers said yesterday.

"Nineteen members of the Zemim family, including a 3-month-old baby, were decapitated by axes," the newspaper said.

"One baby, aged two months, was pulled from the arms of its mother, who begged the terrorists to kill her before killing her child. The baby was decapitated, then burnt before the eyes of its parents.

"The latest killings bring to at least 250 the toll among civilians in the past 10 days and to more than 1,000 the number of people killed since June 5. Officials blame Muslim rebels for the killings."

When we read such ghoulish accounts, we recoil. In self-defence, our minds almost shut down their cognitive capability so as to be both unwilling and unable to imagine the details.

Beyond the political-ideological questions that beg to be asked about the butchery and slaughter, there remains a far simpler question: How could one human being commit such acts against other human beings?

Alas, it is a question that humanity, and in particular, the Jewish people, asks itself every few years, and for which there is only a terse but hardly satisfying answer.

There is evil in the world. It must be confronted, without compromise, in all its manifestations at all stages.

But the political-ideological questions must also be asked. The situation in Algeria has implications far beyond its borders.

What happens in Algeria is likely to have an impact on the Arab world, especially on the countries of the North African coast, Egypt, Tunisia and Morocco.

In addition, the impact of political upheaval in Algeria could also be felt in the southern European countries that share historical, economic and cultural ties with it such as France, Italy and Spain.

To attempt briefly to answer these "larger" questions I turned to certain typically informative material from the Canada-Israel Committee which recently came across my desk.

France colonized Algeria in the 1840s. At one time, more than one million French lived there. It gained its independence from France in 1962. At that time, more than two million of the descendants of the French who had lived in Algeria fled to France along with more than 700,000 Algerians.

Radical, extremist Islam

With an area of almost one million square miles, Algeria is the second largest country in Africa and the 10th largest in the world. It has a population of approximately 28 million people, of whom more than 40 percent are under the age of 15.

This latter figure is significant given the fact that more than 30 percent of Algerians are unemployed. Oil is its main industry and source of foreign revenue. Poverty abounds.

It is in this seething mix of poverty and youth that the proponents of radical, extremist Islam find followers.

The country has been embroiled in civil war since 1991. Islamic fundamentalists are fighting the military governing regime of Liamine Zeroual. Estimates of the number of people who have been killed in this war range as high as 60,000. As we know from the occasional snippets of news that find their way to the west, it has been a war of the most sordid and brutal nature.

The tripwire event of the current insurrection was the elections of 1991. The extremists began their war, although rioting and protesting occurred throughout the 1980's, after the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) swept the initial round of the country's first free elections, in December 1991.

Fearful that a fundamentalist Islamic regime was about to rise, the military ousted president Chadi Benjedid, banned the second round of elections and then banned the FIS from standing as a political party.

According to Dr. Bruce Maddy-Weitzman of the Dayan Centre of Tel Aviv University, the armed struggle against the regime of Zeroual has been conducted by two loosely organized bodies. The larger is the l'Arme Islamique du Salut (AIS), known until May 1994 as the Movement Islamique Arme (MIA) which functions as the FIS's unofficial armed wing.

The other, smaller armed Islamic coalition of different armed networks is the Group Islamique Arme (GIA).

After the AIS stated last January that it wished to abandon armed struggle in favor of "democracy, elections and ballots," the GIA declared war on the AIS, claiming it had weakened the Islamic struggle.

As Maddy-Weitzman has described the GIA, "(it) is 'purist' in its advocacy of unbridled violence and rejects any suggestions of dialogue with the regime.

"Their approach may be said to constitute an Islamic version of Frantz Fanon's teachings on the cleansing, purifying properties of violence, alternatively, of the Khmer Rouge's version of how to build a new society. The disagreements and even open warfare between the GIA and the FIS led to sharp disagreements and even open warfare between them."

Thus, the war in Algeria – and the ensuing slaughter – is not only between a brutish military government and extremist Islamic insurrectionists; it is also between the extremist Islamic insurrectionists themselves.

But very little of the war's dirty, repulsive details ever make it to the west.

In next week's column I shall explore some of the reasons why.

Police urged to lay hate charges in skinhead march

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is calling on police to lay hate charges against neo-Nazi skinheads who picketed the motel that is home to Gypsy refugee claimants.

About two dozen skinheads, some carrying swastika flags, others carrying the Maple Leaf, marched in front of a Scarborough motel chanting "Gypsies out." While some gave the Nazi salute others carried placards that stated "Honk if you hate Gypsies" and "Canada is not a trash can."

Metro police from 42 Division monitored the group, positioning themselves between the demonstrators and the Gypsy families.

The demonstrators were "advocating hate against Gypsies," said Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress. Pointing out they used the word "hate" in their placard, he said "if the law was written for anything, this is the scenario it was written for."

"It is unfortunate the situation has reached a point where neo-Nazis believe they can take advantage of the current atmosphere by organizing a hatefest targeting these refugee claimants," said Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

Sgt. Dino Doria of the Metro police hate crimes unit said "we are concerned about what happened... There is an ongoing investigation."

Members of the police street crime unit were on hand during the demonstration as well as officers of the Metro Police security section. "We are on it. Our people were on it. We certainly consider it serious," he said.

CJC's Moshe Ronen

Meanwhile, Farber criticized the silence of religious and political leaders in the face of the racist demonstration.

"Why is it always up to the Jewish community to be outspoken?... Where are the church leaders, the moral leaders of this country?" The issue cries out for their condemnation, he said.

Congress' call for hate charges received the support of the Urban Alliance on Race Relations (UARR). Antony Shelton, the organization's executive director, said "the police should be telling us how many are charged, not if they should be charged."

The Urban Alliance had received several phone calls from Gypsies, who prefer to be called Roma. "They're scared even to go out at night to a convenience store," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada called on the "federal and provincial governments to ensure that new immigrants and refugee claimants are fully protected by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms... We fear a new wave of rising xenophobia and racism," said Rochelle Wilner, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

When contacted by The CJN, Kim McKellar, a spokesperson for the Toronto conference of the United Church, said "we need to stand with people who are being persecuted and if it falls within the hate crimes legislation, we should follow through."

Suzanne Scorsone, a spokesperson for the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto, said she would not comment "on particular situations that may go before the courts." She said the archdiocese supports the anti-hate law but "it's up to the appropriate authorities to deal with it."

In an unexpected development, a man who claimed to be Walter John Froebrich, the march organizer, called The CJN. He said the idea for the demonstration arose informally among the participants. An acknowledged supporter of the Heritage Front, a defunct white supremacist group, Froebrich said the protesters wanted to show their opposition to Gypsy immigrants. He called the recent arrivals "pickpockets and thieves" but denied demonstrators violated the law.

"It's not hatred," he said. "It's freedom of speech, number 1. Let the good hate the evil."

The recent migration to Canada of hundreds of Gypsies has grabbed the public's attention and prompted a sometimes heated debate. They came in the wake of a Czech television documentary on Aug. 6, which portrayed Canada as a land of opportunity that welcomed refugees. Gypsies from the Czech Republic have complained they were the victims of racist attacks by Czech skinheads.

Tuition fees up at day schools

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For kids, it's time once again for new pencils and notebooks. But many parents of the roughly 10,000 students in Metro Toronto's Jewish day schools are facing another round of tuition fee increases.

The increases are described as in line with the cost of living.

Nine of the 13 schools under the Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE) are reporting fee increases for this academic year; tuition at three schools is unchanged from last year; and at one school — Leo Baeck — fees have actually gone down.

The average increase across the board is just over two percent (skewed by the drop at Leo Baeck). Last year, the average rise over the year before was 3.5 percent.

This year's increases are in line with low inflation and a small rise in the cost of living, says Bernard Shoub, director of school finances at the BJE.

Shoub says the decrease in fees at Leo Baeck can be attributed to increased enrolment. "Their overhead has not gone up and it's spread out among more students. So they're passing the savings along to the parents."

He says Leo Baeck's enrolment is growing at an average annual rate of five percent.

Again this year, CHAT has the sharpest rise in tuition. Shoub says that can be attributed to the adding of more programs at the high school.

The rise at Or Haemet came because the Sephardi school is opening its new branch this week in Thornhill, he says.

Ottawa considers U.S. Nazi hunter

By PAUL LUNGEN

Neal Sher

TORONTO — The former head of the U.S. Office of Special Investigations (OSI), that country's top Nazi-hunting office, may be joining Canada's war crimes unit.

Neal Sher, who headed the OSI from 1982 to 1994, confirmed he is negotiating with Canadian officials about an arrangement to join Canada's war crimes unit. However, Sher, who is currently in a private law practice in Washington, D.C., declined to give any details, saying "the process is still unfolding."

The announcement that Sher may join the Canadian war crimes unit was greeted warmly in Canada. Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said Sher "is a legend in the field of bringing to justice Nazi war criminals.

"Nobody has more experience, knowledge and fire in the belly," he said.

"One can't help but welcome reports that the war crimes unit will take on Sher," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

"He's a highly experienced and competent prosecutor with lots of experience... If they listen to his advice, they can become effective. The unit obviously needs his help," Littman said.

John Russell, a spokesperson for the U.S. Justice Department, recalled Sher as "a very vigorous prosecutor. I think he'd be a good asset" for Canada's war crimes unit.

Russell, who worked as an OSI investigator for five years under Sher, said he brings "vigor, drive, knowledge and a sensitivity to the crimes" being investigated.

Paul Vickery, head of Canada's war crimes unit, said negotiations are under way to retain Sher on "a consultancy basis." Any arrangement with Sher must receive ministerial approval, he added.

After leaving the OSI in 1994, Sher served for two years as executive director of AIPAC, a Jewish community organization registered to lobby Congress on U.S./Israeli relations.

UJA Federation launches 1998 campaign

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The UJA Federation campaign is the "glue" that keeps the Toronto Jewish community going, despite attempts to "splinter it," said Rabbi Gunther Plaut at a rousing gala opening of the 1998 campaign attended by a standing-room only crowd of more than 1,000 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

Buoyed by crisp videos focused on the Jewish revival in far-flung areas of the world, and high quality entertainment in a theatre setting, the large crowd cheered the campaign slogan of For One People Forever when it flashed on the screen.

"No one should demonize anyone else," Rabbi Plaut said, referring to the "polarization" in the community. "There are people in the world, perhaps in this community, who believe Jews can be divided from israel. They were very wrong yesterday and they are very wrong today and tomorrow." His last statement was loudly applauded.

Poverty exists underground in the Toronto Jewish community, "away from public gaze," Rabbi Plaut said, and it is one of the reasons the federation's campaign for funds must succeed.

"Identity is a problem with our children and grandchildren as never before," he said. "Among the most vulnerable are Jewish college students."

The desperate needs of Jews in the former Soviet Union were brought home when he and his wife visited a Jewish village so remote they had to go there by helicopter, said Leo Goldhar, 1998 campaign chair.

The needs of Jews in Israel and locally were highlighted in videos presented by the United Israel Appeal of Canada and UJA Federation.

The launch chairs were Carol Kassel and Lawrence Bloomberg.

Canadian singer/song writer Amy Sky headlined the entertainment, which included the five member Israeli troupe Hashavim, four of whom are recent arrivals from the former Soviet Union.

HARRIS HELPS BAYCREST BREAK GROUND

Ontario Premier Mike Harris (centre) helped break ground last week for the Baycrest Centre's new state-of-the-art facility for Jewish seniors. Joining him were (from left) chief benefactors Honey and Barry Sherman; Florence Mintz Geneen, chair of Baycrest's board of directors; Sally Fisher, chair of the resident's council of the Jewish Home for the Aged and her nurse; and Baycrest CEO Stephen Herbert. Joining the hundreds of donors at the event were Health Minister Jim Wilson and Attorney General Charles Harnick. The planned Apotex Centre will replace the current 372-bed Jewish Home for the Aged and add 100 new beds. The addition will be known as the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, and will focus on older adults whose cognitive abilities have been damaged by stroke or other ailments. It's scheduled to open in 1999.

Off the sidelines

We have lately seen welcome signs that the federal government has left the sidelines in the struggle to save the country from the separatists who are intent on destroying it. The signs have appeared in the mail.

It began when Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard conveyed his deep feeling of umbrage to Frank McKenna because McKenna had expressed understanding and even some sympathy to a group of Quebec federalists about the idea of partitioning Quebec.

Federal Intergovernmental Minister Stephane Dion responded to the charges directed by Bouchard against McKenna by pointing out the inconsistency in the separatists' claim that they rest on democratic principles but can ignore the rule of law.

In turn, Quebec's deputy premier, Bernard Landry, picked up the pen, wrote to Dion and accused him and the federal government of being "anti-democratic."

Last week Dion replied to Landry. This was the fifth letter in the four-cornered exchange. He reconfirmed his earlier position that Quebec can only separate from Canada legally, that is, within the norms of internationally accepted rules of law.

"At the very least, I am entitled to insist on a process that is clear, legal and fair not only to me, but also to the seven million human beings who are both Quebecers and Canadians and to the other 22 million human beings who enjoy the good fortune of having Quebec as part of their country."

Dion's position is the true democrat's position. It is the one we support. It is rooted firmly and fairly in the ground of respect for law. It espouses order over chaos, due process over wile and guile, law over anarchy. It is not surprising that Landry has said he will not answer Dion's last missive. He has no answer.

100 Years

In modern times, it crystallized twice. On Aug. 29, 1897, in Basel, Switzerland, with the convening of the first Zionist Congress. And then again, some 51 years later on May 14, 1948 with the Declaration of the State of Israel: Zionism.

On these two dates, the "revolution" of the Jewish people took shape and ultimately found unique, exhilarating and idealistic form.

One can define Zionism as the return by the Jewish people to the land of our ancestors. Of course, the term itself derives from the word Zion, which is not modern. Indeed, it is as old as the yearning itself to return, for Zion originally meant Jerusalem.

As far back as the destruction of the first Temple it was the name and the image that fired the imagination and stirred the soul of the exiles who sat by the shores of the rivers of Babylon.

That name and that image, Zion, in our own time, became the metaphorical and perhaps even the metaphysical mobilizer for an entire people to rise up against its fate – as either a despised or barely tolerated minority within an alien host society – to reclaim and rebuild their ancient, ancestral home. But, in reclaiming and rebuilding their ancient land, the ancient people also reclaimed and rebuilt itself.

That process is ongoing. Indeed, it is never ending, always seeking practical, human, societal fulfilment of the ideals, values and mission that were imparted in the desert to a former slave rabble, that roused our prophets, that inspired our songs by the shores of Babylonian rivers and that led to a conference in a hotel in Basel 100 years ago.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"Before emancipation, the Jew was a stranger among the peoples, but he did not think of making a stand against his fate. He felt himself belonging to a race of his own which had nothing in common with the other people of the country."

Palestinians should work in Arab countries

Yasser Arafat and his supporters among the Palestinian population have been fighting for an independent state in the Middle East.

On the other hand, Arafat has been complaining that Israel has sealed off the West Bank as a result of the suicide bomber's attack in Jerusalem and is preventing Arab workers from entering Israel to work.

You wonder why they still want to be dependent on Israel for jobs and other services?

You would have thought that Arafat would have approached the Arab countries, such as Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Egypt, the Gulf States, who supposedly are supportive of his aspirations, to allow the Palestinians to come to work in these countries?

How are we to understand this contradictory state of affairs?

Religious leaders must speak out

It is time for society as a whole to respond "en masse" and condemn all who encourage, use and promote religious murder as unacceptable, primitive, barbaric and repugnant.

It is time for all religious leaders to speak up and condemn barbaric acts that kill, maim and degrade those who are created in the image of G-d.

Let us see how many clerics and wearers of religious garb will dare promote death and destruction and knowingly supply arms to terrorists when they are thus condemned.

These suicide missionaries are now crippling the civilized world, be it in the New York Trade Centre, the Paris and Tokyo subways, or the heart of London and Jerusalem. By their nature, politicians will not stop using the plebeian masses to achieve their goals, but how in the name of G-d can anyone claim membership in modern society by killing innocents and how can people committed to religious beliefs act like Hitler, Stalin and other anti-religious tyrants?

How long will we, as a progressive civilization, let them kill and maim innocent people while we mollycoddle them with legal niceties and civilized philosophical excuses.

Living survivors need help now!

It is now more than 4½ years since the final restitution to Holocaust survivors, was announced.

While it appears that the German government was willing to help needy survivors, the criteria for eligibility were worded in such a way as to eliminate most of them from receiving it.

While negotiations are ongoing to change the criteria, survivors are old, sick and need help now. The dead don't need any help, the living do, and they are fully entitled to it.

House cleaning needed at the UN

Secretary General Kofi Annan has proposed measures that will streamline and modernize the operations of the United Nations. All the cost saving measures in the world will change nothing, if the members continue to make decisions based on nationalistic, geopolitical and self-serving reasons that foster and perpetuate regional and ideological differences. The best and worst example of this is the failure of the United Nations-created court to bring to justice war criminals from the former Yugoslavia.

The United Nations forces cannot march in because the Russians would object. Notwithstanding the lofty declaration of protecting human rights, the failure to enforce such fundamental principles in countries such as the former Zaire, Cambodia, Indonesia, Somalia and other countries is an international disgrace of gigantic proportions.

On the issue of cost saving and efficient use of time, the secretary general should consider the hundreds of resolutions brought before the United Nations General Assembly condemning Israel for every conceivable transgression real or imagined, just to satisfy the propaganda machine of the Arab countries.

Yet not once has there been a single resolution of the United Nations condemning racism, persecution and aggression (save and except Iraq) directed against totalitarian and dictatorial Arab regimes. In the final analysis, not only does the United Nations need a reality check in eliminating its bloated bureaucracy but a re-evaluation of its founding principles and some semblance of intellectual honesty and a sincere commitment to justice.

A. M. Klein: One of our most important writers

By HARRY HEFT

Last week, in the first instalment of this two-part tribute to A.M. Klein marking the 25th anniversary of his death, I attempted to celebrate the great poet and novelist by providing a general overview of his life and accomplishments. In this week's article, I hope to provide a more fully developed examination of Klein's works and to see how the main preoccupations of his life found their strongest expression in his poetry and fiction. By doing this, it may become possible to understand the qualities of Klein's literary genius that made him one of the most important and influential Canadian writers in history.

As a writer, Klein's first literary influences were clearly derived from the Orthodox environment and studies of his upbringing in the "Jewish ghetto" of Montreal. During the first important phase of his career as a poet in the early 1930s, it was his Jewish heritage that provided most of his inspiration, and his best works of this period explore Jewish themes. Rather than focusing upon Jewish spirituality of theology, though, Klein seemed more intent on exploring Jewish culture or trying to understand the role of Judaism in his own life. During this early period, Klein was struggling to find ways to express the continued relevance of thousands of years of Jewish culture in a new, modern, North American context.

Many of the poems that Klein wrote during this period were eventually published in his first volume, Hath Not a Jew, the title of which is an obvious allusion to Shylock's famous soliloquy on the struggle of the Jew in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. In Hath Not a Jew, Klein's poems examine the survival of the Jewish spirit in the Diaspora, where the Jew has been consistently marginalized. In one of the volume's under-appreciated poems, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Klein recognizes how the condition of wandering has forced the Jew to adopt many different personae, but that no matter what the outward appearance, the Jewish identity survives: "Always and ever,/ Whether in caftan robed, or in tuxedo slicked,/ Whether of bearded chin, or of the jowls shaved blue,/ Always and ever have I been the Jew/ Bewildered, and a man who has been tricked..." In this poem, Klein seems to be making two separate points: first, that the Jew may alter his identity, but that Judaism endures nonetheless; and second, that even if the Jew attempts to conceal his identity, the non-Jewish world will remind him.

Although some of Klein's poems study the Jewish identity in a general sense, he is better remembered for those poems in which he celebrates specific Jewish types or personae, such as the "landlord," the "pintele yid," the "shadchan" or the "junk dealer," all of whom appear in his poem, Portraits of a Minyan.

The poem that is now considered Klein's masterpiece from this period is Out of the Pulver and the Polished Lens, which is written in praise of Baruch Spinoza, the excommunicated Jewish philosopher of Amsterdam.

In the poem, Klein portrays Spinoza as an individual struggling to find a more justifiable relationship with God than the one found in more conventional Judaism, and turning toward nature in the process: "Thou art everywhere, a pillar to thy sanctuary is every blade of grass./ Wherefore I said to the wicked. Go to the ant, thou sluggard, seek thou an audience with God./ On the swift wings of a star, even on the numb legs of a snail, thou dost move, O Lord." Klein depicts Spinoza as an individual who is banished to the fringe of society because he is searching for more valid answers than those which mainstream culture can tolerate. This theme is repeated in much of Klein's best work.

Toward the end of this major period of poetic activity, in the mid-1930s, Klein began to recognize the growing threat of the emerging Nazi government in Germany and dedicated much of his energy to writing newspaper editorials in which he argued the urgency of fighting this evil force immediately. Klein's longtime literary battle with Nazism culminated in his poem, The Hitleriad, which was eventually published by the prestigious American press, New Directions.

The Hitleriad is written as a mock-epic poem in which Hitler and his highest ranking officials are parodied by Klein for their various laughable shortcomings: "Frustrated men, who'd tried all things, and failed,/ And then determined to be jailed, or hailed!/ Herr Goebbels such a one –/ Club footed, rat faced, halitotic, the/ Brave Nordic ideal, a contrario!" Although Klein's intentions and literary skills in writing The Hitleriad were sound, the poem was considered a failure when it was published, since it appeared to be an overly clever and stylized way of addressing a topic that required blunt action.

In the early 1940s, Klein entered the second major phase of his career as a poet and turned his attention to a range of topics beyond his immediate milieu. He began writing poems about the other communities that surrounded him, such as the Québécois and Canadian natives. His poems on the subject of French Canada were so successful that the Canadian Jewish Congress published them as a pamphlet to be circulated in Quebec in order to improve relations between the communities.

Among Klein's finest poems from this period is Montreal, in which he attempted to celebrate the cultural mix of his city by writing in an experimental language in which every word could as easily be interpreted in English and French. "I,/ Auditor of your music, cherish the/ Joined double-melodied vocabulaire,/ Where English vocable and roll Ecossic,/ Bilinguefact your air!" The triumph of Montreal is Klein's ability to write about a city where different languages coexist in a language that embodies that coexistence.

Many of the poems from this second period of poetic activity were published in 1948 in Klein's last volume of poetry, The Rocking Chair. The final poem of the volume, Portrait of the Poet as Landscape, is one of the most intense and arguably the greatest poem that Klein wrote, considered by some to be one of the greatest poems ever written by any Canadian poet.

In the poem, Klein paints a bleak picture of the condition of the artist in modern society. The world has become so indifferent to poetry that "from our real society/ [the poet] has disappeared; he simply does not count." Because he has been forgotten, the poet is filled with self-loathing, and begins to see himself as "throwback, relief, freak,/ his mother's miscarriage, his great-grandfather's ghost." But ultimately, despite this alienation, the poet begins to find comfort in the meaning that exists in his craft: "For to praise/ the world – he, solitary man – is breath/ to him. Until it has been praised, that part/ has not been." The poet's function is not necessarily to belong in the world, but constantly to bring the world into existence, and to bring significance to his world, through his writing.

While The Rocking Chair was Klein's highest artistic achievement, it also represented the end of his career as a poet. After 1948, Klein was to complete only one more sustained literary work, his novel The Second Scroll, which was published in 1951. The novel was inspired by a trip Klein took to the newly created State of Israel in 1949, a trip sponsored by the Canadian Jewish Congress. Although the main purpose was to allow Klein to gather information that he could later use on a fundraising tour, Klein felt that he had seen a modern miracle in Israel, and he attempted to capture that miracle in his story.

In the novel, a Canadian editor is sent by his publisher to Israel to collect a volume of new Israeli poetry. Before his departure, the editor discovers that his uncle, Melech Davidson, has survived the Holocaust, and he decides to use his trip as an opportunity to find his uncle. The chapters of the novel are modeled upon the five books of the Torah and as the story progresses, it becomes increasingly evident that Melech is a messianic figure leading his nephew across Europe and into Israel. The nephew comes to see the rebirth of Israel as the redemption of the Jewish people in the aftermath of the Holocaust, and the new poetry of Israel is found in the rejuvenation of the Hebrew language. Melech, as Messiah, remains ever evasive, but in following in his path, his nephew is able to find renewal in the Jewish spirit.

Many critics have considered Klein's greatest literary achievement to be in his sensitivity to minority cultures, his study of the individual against society or his role in bringing Modernism to Canada. But perhaps, on the 25th anniversary of his death, it may be more appropriate to see him as the writer who lived through a historical period of trauma and conflict, and who nonetheless always aspired in his writing to put the world right through reconciliation.

In a province where cultures were at odds, Klein created a language that brought all disparate peoples together. In a world where Nazism was causing mass destruction, Klein's poetry promised the ultimate triumph of virtue. And in the aftermath of destruction, Klein found redemption. Though the conflicts of the world may have defeated him personally, his gift to his readers was the hope of resolution.

Harry Heft recently returned from a visiting professorship at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and is the author of a new book On Your Mark, published by Macmillan.

Heirloom

My father bequeathed me no wide estates;
No keys and ledgers were my heritage;
Only some holy books with yahrzeit dates
Writ mournfully upon a blank front page –

Books of the Baal Shem Tov, and of his wonders;
Pamphlets upon the devil and his crew;
Prayers against road demons, witches, thunders;
And sundry other tomes for a good Jew.

Beautiful: though no pictures on them, save
The scorpion crawling on a printed track;
The Virgin floating on a scriptural wave,
Square letters twinkling in the Zodiac.

The tallow stains of midnight liturgy –
These are my coat of arms, and these unfold
My noble lineage, my proud ancestry!

And my tears, too, have stained this heirloomed ground,
When reading in these treatises some weird
Miracle, I turned a leaf and found
A white hair fallen from my father's beard.

Opinions

The mirror has two faces

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

It isn't easy to find self-critical voices in Arab society. The absence of a tradition of free speech and the prevalence of a patriarchal hierarchy make it difficult for such voices to be heard and to survive. But it is worth listening to those voices that do speak up courageously. As observers of the Middle East are commenting on the new divide in the region – between those committed to peace and those who are not – self-critical voices provide a valuable, helpful insight into the internal debates in the Arab world.

One such voice is that of Daoud Kuttab, the Palestinian journalist who was arrested last spring by the Palestinian police in Ramallah for broadcasting live sessions of the Palestinian Legislative Authority. Kuttab made it clear that the issue of his arrest, and other violations of freedom of the press, were an internal Palestinian issue that had little to do with the Palestinian relationship with Israel. Such actions by the Palestinian authorities reflect their difficult transition from a guerrilla movement to a government responsible for the welfare of two million people.

While polls show that 71 percent of Palestinians want council sessions to be broadcast, the authorities want to cut the council off from public view. To Arafat and some around him, democracy is of secondary importance at best, and the struggle for independence is paramount. They see no connection between the two, unlike Kuttab, for whom democracy is essential for the evolution of the Palestinian state he would like to see. The internal debate about progress towards democracy is complicated by the fact that to satisfy Israel's demands for a crackdown on the infrastructure of terrorism, Arafat has to act in ways that are anything but democratic.

A second, serious indictment of Arab society was recently published in the London daily, Al-Itihad, by Salah Bashir and Hazem Saariya. These two writers believe that the absence of democracy and the inherent nature of Arab society make it impossible for Israelis to have confidence in the Arab commitment to peace. Furthermore, they argue, progress towards democracy may paradoxically work against peace, because among the people are many voices who oppose the regimes and the policy of making peace with Israel. This is the case in Egypt, Jordan and certainly within the Palestinian community.

Peace, say Bashir and Saariya, is a construct of the rulers, rather than a product of popular desire. The resulting status quo of little progress works to Israel's advantage: There is no need for Israel to pay the price of peace, while the status quo strengthens the hand of those Israelis who distrust the Arabs and who warn of the security risks inherent in the peace process. The Arabs, in turn, can neither wage effective war nor make effective peace.

Bashir and Saariya concede that Israel has legitimate security concerns, but they believe that the Arabs, especially the pan-Arab and fundamentalist groups, play specifically into the hands of the disbelievers in peace in Israel, by opposing normalization and by seeing Israel as the eternal enemy.

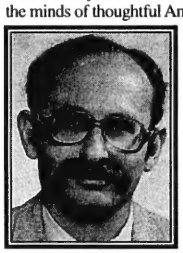
Given the pessimism of their analysis, their conclusion is surprising. Bashir and Saariya believe that Arab societies have no choice but to move towards peace agreements with Israel. Therefore, their answer is not to give up or wait until democracy comes to societies that are governed by different traditions, but to find ways to create dialogues that are not strictly political. Such efforts at "normalization," initiated by Arabs, they argue, will strengthen the hand of the believers in Israel and will develop a greater constituency for peace on both sides. These efforts should come early in the process, rather than being its conclusion.

The prescription may be dismissed as being dubious and naive by many, but in this case, the diagnosis is more important.

A mirror image of the debate is unfolding in Israel. The government of Benjamin Netanyahu, in ironic agreement with the Bashir-Saariya thesis, has repeatedly stated that in the absence of a move towards democracy, Arab societies cannot be relied upon. Therefore, the best that one can hope for is a "cold-war" peace, upheld largely by Israel's deterrent capability.

In contrast, proponents of the peace process say that moving forward is first and foremost in Israel's self-interest, given the cost – not in financial terms – of continued occupation of close to one million Palestinians. They also argue that the Arabs need to be provided with incentives to develop their people's commitment to peace, and they cite economic cooperation and other forms of "normalization" as examples. Indeed, the "peace industry" that aims at creating such opportunities continues to thrive in academic, non-political circles, even as the political process is stalled. The partners on the Arab side are voices such as those of Kuttab, Bashir and Saariya. They deserve a fair hearing, at home and abroad.

Jews in Canada and the U.S.



By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Two engaging recent books offer some insight into the future of American Jewry, the hold that Christianity has on the minds of thoughtful American Jews, and by extension, how that differs from the Canadian case.

The first is by Elliott Abrams, assistant secretary of state in the Reagan administration and son-in-law of former Commentary editor Norman Podhoretz. While the book is titled Faith or Fear, what is more interesting is the subtitle: How Jews Can Survive in a Christian America.

Abrams calls upon Jews to stop fearing Christians, including fundamentalists, and instead to make common cause with them against the more dangerous liberal secularists, who pose the greatest danger for Jewish continuity. He sees the Pat Buchanans of the United States as more of a nuisance than a serious threat. Buchanan's ultimate electoral failure is proof that anti-Semitism – and bigotry in general – is a hard sell in the United States.

There are several reasons to call for a vigorous Christianity in America, from a Jewish survivalist perspective. If America becomes more devoutly Christian, there is less chance that gentiles will want to marry Jews, as they clearly do at present! And on issues like the defence of Israel, Christian support is indeed strong.

Abrams' critique of the Jewish alliance with liberalism, anticipated by earlier writings of Podhoretz, Irving Kristol and Ruth Wisse, is not shared by Harvard law professor Alan M. Dershowitz. Dershowitz, who in The Vanishing American Jew is as apprehensive as Abrams about the demographic dangers facing Jews, is worried about the dangers of the Christian right and their "Jewish allies." For him, American Christianity in its conservative form is the enemy of an American Jewry which is – and ought to remain – committed to liberalism and the strict separation of church and state. While Dershowitz makes the point that anti-Semitism is no longer a serious threat to American Jews, he nevertheless devotes roughly 30 percent of the book to discussing its various aspects.

The two naturally differ in their prescriptions. Abrams seems to call for a return to traditional, quasi-Orthodox Jewish expression exemplified by Torah. But he is not clear why such an appeal would work and how it could be pitched successfully to the large majority of non-Orthodox American Jews.

Dershowitz, by contrast, recognizes in almost Reconstructionist-like terms that Judaism is entering a new phase in its history as "an evolving civilization." Dershowitz seeks to synthesize traditional and modern Jewish texts with the world view of largely secular, liberal Jews. He wants to use Jewish learning as a vehicle to emphasize the moral, ethical and spiritual elements of the Jewish heritage, over mere rituals.

As a sociologist and something of a behaviorist, I think Dershowitz is too quick to dismiss rituals – both old and new – as a cornerstone of meaningful Jewish survival. His intellectually focused formula may work for professors, and his emphasis on texts and learning is certainly laudable. But his call for a "new Jewish civilization" not rooted in the Divine and which he will help create smacks of, well, chutzpah.

From a Canadian perspective, what is interesting about both books is the relative obsession with Christianity and anti-Semitism. The American constitutional separation of church and state has made American Jewish liberals hypersensitive to perceived dangers of an encroaching, expansive Christianity. In Canada, religious expressions are protected via direct and indirect government action, including certain dimensions of multicultural policy. And provincial governments can offer financial support to religious schools.

On the other hand, American Jewish neoconservatives may make too much of the Christian model. There is no guarantee that increasing religiosity will not lead to greater intolerance between faiths and within Judaism. Certainly for the past two decades, religion and religiously-linked policy debates have fostered a polarizing harshness in American public life. They do not do so in Canada.

Both the liberalism of Dershowitz and the neo-conservatism of Abrams nurture a conception of Jewishness in which ethnic or cultural elements are given short shrift. This too is typically American. Jews are seen as one of the three major faiths of the Judeo-Christian tradition and not as an ethnocultural group. This is because American Jews are likely to be one generation further removed from the culture of the old country than Canadians. In short, the kind of pessimism underlying both books is not (yet) warranted for the Canadian Jewish scene.

The Osnos file

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Recently, courtesy of my son, I received a copy of the Detroit News of June 24. A large picture on the front page of one section showed a gentleman who I knew well. His name is Walter Stark. Whenever I have the opportunity to visit the Detroit area, I phone him and arrange for a game of tennis (at which he excels).

We are about the same age and he too emigrated to the United States in the 1930s. Here is the story of that migration, which the newspaper article covered in great and fascinating detail.

Stark's family, like mine, lived in Germany – his in Munich, mine in Berlin. He was convinced that the Nazis were a deadly threat to the Jews, though his family believed that the Nazi regime was a passing event. In this too, our families were alike.

It so happened that his father, who was in the clothing business, had an employee by the name of Albert Schmidt, a gentile who was about to emigrate to the United States. Stark's father did not think that Schmidt had proper clothes with which to impress his future employer in Detroit and asked him to pick out some new suits as a farewell present. Schmidt did so and did not forget his employer's thoughtfulness.

For when Walter Stark wrote him that he and his family also wanted to emigrate and wondered whether Schmidt could talk to his new employer about possibly giving the Starks an affidavit, Schmidt gladly complied. He spoke of the request to his new employer, a Jew named Herman Osnos, owner of Sam's Cutrate Inc.

A lengthy correspondence ensued between young Walter Stark (he was still in his teens) and Osnos, amounting to a thick file that was discovered only recently by Osnos' son, Gilbert, who lives in Stamford, Conn. The letters from young Stark to Osnos in Detroit covered several years, and with every letter, the young man's request became more urgent. In the end, Herman Osnos complied, and this jubilant telegram is found in the files: "Documents arrived safely. Thousand thanks! Stark."

It was none too early. Kristallnacht was about to happen and police in Munich tipped off the Stark family that danger was in the offing. (In this respect, too, our lives paralleled, for in Berlin a policeman warned my father also).

The elder Starks, like my Dad, disappeared into temporary hiding, and shortly thereafter, both families were able to leave Germany. My parents went first to England, the Starks to Detroit. Alas, both of our families had many relatives who were caught by the Nazi killing machine and perished.

Young Stark grew up to be a successful engineer and he never forgot what the Osnos family had done for him. The tale of the Stark-Schmidt-Osnos triangle reminds me of a line in Kohelet (Ecclesiastes): "Cast your bread upon the waters, and it will return to you after many days."

The suits that Albert had picked out in Munich as his goodbye present were indeed the "bread" of which the Bible speaks.

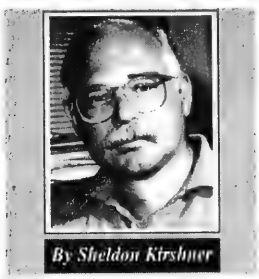
California's gold rush Jewish communities



When gold was discovered at Sutter's Mill in 1848, thousands of prospectors, adventurers and merchants descended on the site, touching off the great, short-lived California gold rush.

As a result of the stampede, mining towns such as Marysville and Sonora sprang up. The makeshift settlements attracted not only native Americans but foreigners from around the world. Among the fortune seekers were Jews, who established communities in chaotic frontier conditions.

These Jewish communities did not last long. Once the gold was depleted, people moved on, leaving behind cemeteries, buildings, an array of documents and fading memories.

Ava Kahn, an American historian affiliated with the Jewish Museum of the West in Berkeley, Calif., has studied this period. At a recent academic conference in Colorado, she delivered a paper entitled Traditions During Chaos: Jewish Life in California Gold Rush Mining Towns.

Kahn's monograph is based on letters, newspaper reports, minutes of meetings, obituaries and marriage certificates. She intends to write a book on the subject.

Kahn believes that these mining towns deserve to be studied not as anomalies, but as "integral parts" of the development of 19th century American Jewry.

According to Kahn, many of the Jews who went to California opened small shops which supplied miners with clothing, dry goods and food. Anti-Semitism existed, but Jews were generally respected because they provided needed services and were often perceived as just another group of foreigners in what was an alien environment for all.

In some towns, such as Sonora, which was founded by Mexicans, the Jewish community and the town emerged at the same time. One of Sonora's first settlers was Emanuel Linoberg, a Polish Jew who immigrated to the United States in 1849. A prosperous merchant, he also owned an entertainment hall, a gold mine and a ranch.

Linoberg, who died of a stroke at the age of 40, was president of the Hebrew Congregation. Kahn writes that Jews in mining towns usually observed major holidays. Some followed traditional Judaism, while others supported the growing Reform movement.

None of the communities, however, were large enough to engage permanent rabbis. More often than not, High Holy Day services, marriages and circumcisions were conducted by rabbis from San Francisco.

When the gold rush ended in the 1870s and 1880s, the majority of Jews in mining towns left and headed for big cities like San Francisco and Sacramento.

Buildings mouldered away and cemeteries fell into disrepair. In Marysville, for example, tombstones crumbled and toppled over. But Marysville's Jewish cemetery has not been forgotten. It will be restored by the Commission for the Preservation of Pioneer Jewish Cemeteries and Landmarks, a division of the Judah Magnes Museum, which houses the Jewish Museum of the West. Recently, the museum published A Traveller's Guide to Jewish Cemeteries of the California Gold Rush by archivist Susan Morris.

Readers who wish to explore this topic further may buy a 42-minute video by Bill Chayes called Birth of a Community: Jews and the Gold Rush. It is available at the Judah Magnes Museum (2911 Russell St., Berkeley, Calif.).

A reasoned look at intermarriage

Intermarriage is and has been perceived as a threat to Jewish continuity. In the United States, with the world's largest Jewish population, intermarriage has been incrementally growing. According to the latest data, compiled by the National Jewish Population Survey, the intermarriage rate has reached 52 percent, an increase of 500 percent since the 1960s. To put it another way, one-third of Jewish households in the Unite States today contain a non-Jewish spouse.

Some are crying gevalt. Two decades ago, when the rate was about 30 percent, a Harvard University demographer, Elihu Bergman, warned that if the trend continued the Jewish population, then estimated at 5.7 million, would shrink to 10,000 by the year 2076.

Ellen Jaffe McClain, a Los Angeles teacher, claims that such reports are unduly alarmist, and that intermarriage is less of a threat to American Jewry than is commonly assumed.

In her provocative book, Embracing the Stranger (HarperCollins, $35), whose reflections can be applied to Canada or any other country with a sizable Jewish community, Jaffe McClain concludes that statistics can be misleading, and urges readers not to stereotype Jews who marry non-Jews.

As for her first contention, she writes that too many Jewish leaders use statistics "to read too many people out of Jewish life." Citing the research of sociologist Egon Mayer, she reminds us that there are approximately 150,000 Americans (and counting) who are descendants of two generations of intermarriage and who consider themselves to be Jews.

And furthermore, she points out, a fair number of intermarried Jews, such as herself, are Jewishly involved. She and her husband observe Shabbat as well as Jewish holidays.

She readily acknowledges that intermarriage often means that the offspring of these unions are raised as Christians. But by the same token, she urges Jewish communities not to ostracize Jews who wed non-Jews.

"Converts and prospective converts to Judaism probably face more rejection, suspicion, blind prejudice and just plain bad attitude than any other spiritual seekers," she observes.

Converts face rejection

And, she adds, rabbis turn away potential converts far too often, sometimes because they can't be bothered with engaging themselves in what is usually a time-consuming process.

Jaffe McClain regards outreach programs, which have existed since the mid-1960s, as promising. They bring intermarried Jews, their partners and their children into Jewish life.

Jaffe McClain, however, admits that intermarriage is taking its toll.

"The model of American Jewry that seems to be taking hold as we head into the next century seems to involve a firm core of committed Jews surrounded by a wide, mushy ring of Jews who are more and more alienated from Jewish life the further you get from the core," she writes.

"Think of a matzoh ball in a big plate of chicken soup. The matzoh ball is the American Jewish community, and the soup is American society."

Food for thought.

Elul helps us prepare for High Holy Days

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The month of Elul precedes the start of the High Holy Days.

Most Jews are aware of the importance placed by our culture on the High Holy Days. It is a time when we stand in awe of a Greater Power and attempt to grasp the concept that although we are responsible for our actions, we are not the final masters of our destinies. Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are times when we focus on the tremendous discrepancies between our mortal existence and Omnipotent Infinity. Yet despite these discrepancies, we are expected to engage in a relationship with the Divine.

We are expected to communicate and negotiate, but what is the foundation for this relationship whose enormity will overwhelm us in one short month? The month of Elul may offer us a glimpse of an answer.

The rabbis noticed that the name of the month – "Elul" – can be understood as the initials of a well-known Hebrew phrase: "Ani ledodi vedodi li." In Hebrew, the beginning consonants of this phrase are identical to the consonants of "Elul." The phrase means "I am for my beloved and my beloved is for me."

It is a quote from the biblical book, Song of Songs, which is a dialogue of love. The Song of Songs speaks of intimacies between lovers, and Rabbi Akiva added to this meaning that the book also speaks of the relationship between God and Israel. It is a relationship of love and intimacy and longing.

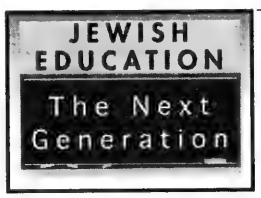
The Talmud states: "You shall make the Lord beloved." The statement does not speak of emotion, but rather speaks of action. The Zohar comments: "How does one love the Lord? By encompassing oneself with benevolence on every side, by doing benevolence to all without sparing your strength or your property."

It is clear that the love of God must be actively expressed and not simply felt. We make God our beloved by dealing positively with the world around us. And yet part of an intimate relationship is the aspect of longing.

There is an ancient midrash that speaks of a palm tree that bore no fruit. All attempts to nurture the tree failed until one palm gardener told the townspeople that the tall palm tree could see another palm tree in Jericho and was longing for her. The people of the community immediately grafted a branch from the tree in Jericho onto the first palm tree and it then bore fruit.

The image of the first tree, knowing what it needed but anchored to its spot unable to fulfil its longing, speaks to every person. There are times when the reality of our lives keeps us away from spirituality and yet we continue to long for it.

Before the High Holy Days arrive, we are given the month of Elul in which to prepare. During this month, the month when we concentrate on the positive, we should also take note of the wisdom conveyed in the midrash. Although it is a time of introspection, we must always be aware of those around us who are longing for connections. We must be the palm gardener who observes and the community who reacts.



The price of Torah is worth paying

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Recently a parent confided to me that, after having sent their daughter to a day school for many years, he and his wife were now enrolling her in a public high school because "we want her to gain a wider exposure to different people and ideas. Day school can be quite confining, you know."

The strangely Kafkaesque feel of this assertion – the sense that Jewish day schools are somehow insular and surreal – is only furthered by its inherent vagueness.

The credo of a "wider exposure" does not admit of too much scrutiny. Indeed, one would be hard pressed to explain how, by definition, public school is the road to an expansive view of reality, the more likely conduit to creating a generation-X of Renaissance men and women. Yet this idea is the often voiced mantra of many Jewish parents in our time, despite its intellectual dubiousness.

Do we mean to say that we are willing to put our children's Jewish education and hence an important component of their Jewish identity at risk because we feel they are multiculturally deprived?

Or perhaps this is not the issue at all. Perhaps what this September swan song is all about is money, specifically the very real problem of paying thousands of dollars in tuition. Is learning a little Talmud and becoming familiar with the Balfour Declaration really worth digging into the family pocketbook? Somewhere beneath the "I want my child to be a citizen of the world" speechmaking cited above, one can feel the anxiety.

Some parents joke about tuitions, a few are almost lewdly proud of their ability to pay. Most of us, though, have very real concerns about the price of Torah these days.

Rorschach of the soul

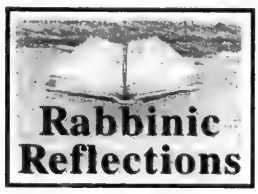
But sympathy for the groaning budget must also be tempered by some honest introspection. "We can't afford it" is never an objective statement. It is a Rorschach of the contemporary soul, of what we value and what we would like to overlook.

Financial prosperity, as the Torah incisively narrates, must always be integrated into a total grasp of what is the good life and how do I achieve it. The Torah's textbook model of what happens when money alone talks is Abraham's nephew, Lot. Chapter 12 of Genesis finds Lot investing in some prime real estate, "well-watered" farmland. Alas, this shrewd financial venture has one drawback; he now lives in the unfriendly confines of Sodom, the city that epitomized moral corruption and societal breakdown. Lot finds that his perfectly balanced cheque book is more than offset by the rape gangs that literally bang at his door, looking to assault his guests.

Of course, our various local public schools are scarcely candidates for a divine visitation of fire and brimstone. And for many, tuition fees are not a replacement for luxury items; they are competition for the grocery list. Nonetheless, Judaism's unflinching eye lights upon a growing number of parents who would choose to spend money on certain lifestyle items and not on their children's Jewish education.

When all the rationalizations are done, what this points to is the fact that many parents seem unconcerned about ransoming their children's Jewish future. Why? Because – and here's the dirty little secret – they are ambivalent about their own Jewish identities. Why pay for something that you're not really sure matters in the long run?

It will be interesting to see the outcome of these choices in years to come. Beware the knock on the door in the middle of the night, her non-Jewish boyfriend come to gallantly expose her to a whole wide world of people and ideas.



Prayer practised daily a service of the heart

By RABBI CHARLES FREUNDLICH

There's a story told about a wealthy Jewish tourist who was mountain climbing in Switzerland. One day he found himself on a wood and rope bridge that connected two peaks. Below was a deep ravine.

As he began crossing the bridge, a wind began to blow hard, causing the bridge to sway back and forth. He felt his life was in peril and was terrified to see the deep ravine below. In his moment of fear he looked upwards and prayed. "I'll give $100,000 to the United Jewish Appeal."

Immediately, the wind stopped blowing and the bridge became steady. As he came to the end of the bridge, he looked upward and said, "Can I make it $50,000?" And suddenly the wind began to howl and the bridge began to sway back and forth.

The man smiled, "I was only joking, God."

Many of us, like the wealthy tourist, discover religion in moments of crisis or danger. We turn to God and the synagogue seeking comfort and support. When medical treatment seems futile we ask for a special prayer – a mi sheberach.

But religion, like any art or skill, is most beneficial when used and practised on a regular basis. Prayer cannot become meaningful when used only on special occasions. A regular discipline of prayer practised daily warms us to the heightened excitement of the service of the heart.

The superstars of baseball will get a hit every third time at bat. And to achieve this percentage, a rigorous training program is required. We all need a disciplined program of religious observance throughout our daily life to experience the special high peaks of religious emotion.

Some of my favorite sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The month of Elul is finally here and that means Rosh Hashanah is less than a month away. As the year draws to a close, I'd like to share with you the best sites that I've travelled on the Jewish Highway.

Today, I will focus on several excellent sites which catalogue thousands of other pages with Jewish or Israeli content. In future columns, I will focus on individual Web pages that I find myself visiting over and over again.

The Ultimate Jewish/Israel Link Launcher [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/launcher.html] was the first massive compendium of Jewish sites I ever stumbled on. After browsing through Steve Ruttenberg's links, I was convinced that a column devoted to the Jewish Internet would have no shortage of material. Kol Hakavod to Steve for a site that never disappoints!

Over the past year, Matthew Album's Maven: More than 5,000 Jewish/Israel Links [http://www.maven.co.il/] has transformed itself into a slick, well organized Jewish site catalogue and search engine. I particularly like Maven's weekly newsletter list that announces the latest sites to join the Jewish Highway [http://www.maven.co.il/subscribe.htm].

The Digital Genizah [http://uscj.org/metny/middletown/genizah.htm] is not only an elegant site but also has a marvellous name. (A genizah is the traditional name for a repository for ancient, sacred Jewish works.) Mark C. Bassell of Temple Sinai in Middletown, N.Y., has also done a wonderful job.

There's more. Definitely worth a look are Gerry Hoch's Jewish Links [http://alcor.concordia.ca/~g_hoch/bumnet.html], the Jewish Communication Network's JC-Navigate [http://www.jcn18.com/jhot00.htm] and Andrew Tannenbaum's Judaism and Jewish Resources [http://shamash.org/trb/judaism.html].

If you want to focus your search on Israel, then try The (almost) Complete Guide to WWW in Israel [http://www.math.technion.ac.il/~nyh/israel/]. There are several other excellent Israeli search engines, which I will describe in a future column.

And don't forget about some of the standard search engines such as Altavista [http://altavista.digital.com/], Lycos [http://www.lycos.com/] and Web directories like Yahoo [http://www.yahoo.com/Society_and_culture/Religion/Judaism], [http://www.yahoo.com/text/Regional/Countries/Israel].

Finally, I recommend taking a look at the Jewish Ring [http://yarra.vicnet.net.au/~aragorn/jewring.htm]. This is an example of an Internet Webring, which is simply a collection of sites on a common theme, in this case 140 sites about Judaism. If you type the following address [http://www.webring.org/cgi-bin/webring?ring=jewish&id=85&random] one of those sites will appear at random. So what I've done is make that address my browser's "Home Page." Every time I turn on my browser, I am automatically transported to a different Jewish site!

Well, that should keep you busy for a while. Next time we'll continue our year-end journey by looking at some of the best stops on the Jewish Highway.

Katz celebrates his 100th birthday

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The accolades flowed as friends and family toasted and lightly roasted William Katz at a recent celebration marking his 100th birthday.

The birthday bash, which drew more than 125 people from four generations, was also a reunion for many members of Katz's extended family, who had come from as far away as Israel, Chicago and Los Angeles.

The festivities included the presentation of a plaque inscribed with a poem written especially for Katz by Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch, speeches by grandchildren, great-grandchildren and other family members, as well as plenty of reminiscing.

A stranger to the party would have been hard pressed to identify the centenarian in the group. Katz, looking dapper in a light summer suit and rose boutonniere, looks at least 15 years younger than his remarkable age. He walks erect and unassisted and has only a slight hearing loss.

He lives independently in the apartment he has lived in for the last 25 years, but since he stopped driving three years ago, he depends on friends and family for transportation. A staunch Yiddishist, he participates in three weekly Yiddish reading groups and attends two to five concerts or programs with Jewish or Yiddish content a month.

Katz said his love affair with Yiddish literature began after he immigrated to Canada in 1920. In the Polish shtetl where he grew up, the only reading material available was the Talmud and the Bible, but in Canada he could obtain Yiddish books on every subject imaginable. "It was an open world," he said.

He left Poland in 1919 to avoid the draft, because he had no interest in serving in an anti-Semitic army, he said. He worked in Germany for a year and through sheer luck, was able to secure free passage to Canada. The ticket was paid for by the American uncle of a cousin who was not able to travel. As Katz remarked, "My life has been a series of miracles."

He arrived in Canada with $25 borrowed from a friend and the address of the Shidlowsky family, relatives of a friend. He fell in love with the Shidlowskys' daughter, Bluma, whom he married in 1922.

The union was beshert, he said. "She was waiting for me. I had to travel and go through all that hardship to meet her."

She died in 1972.

One of Katz's most important miracles was that he came to Canada in time to sponsor his brother and two sisters, who arrived in Toronto in 1924. He contends they would have perished in the Holocaust had he not immigrated here when he did, noting sadly that his efforts to sponsor a half-sister a decade later were unsuccessful and she did not survive the war.

Katz had learned the shoemaker's trade in Poland, but unable to find employment here, he worked at a number of jobs in the apparel industry, from hat making to embroidery. A leftist and supporter of progressive causes, Katz helped found the embroidery local of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union.

He said he was such "a good union member" that he couldn't get a job in Canada and had to work in Chicago to support his wife and their only child, Ida Abrams, who stayed in Toronto.

Katz is still a charter member of the Labor League Mutual Benefit Society, later renamed United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), founded in 1926. He has served in many executive positions at UJPO and continues to be active, attending a lodge brunch and executive meeting monthly.

In 1930, Katz became a partner in a small embroidery shop on Adelaide Street where he worked until 1972.

In his retirement he took up folk and ballroom dancing, which he kept up until his 97th birthday. He said dancing has kept him in good shape over the years.

Katz attributes his good health and long life to the fact that he does not allow himself to get irritated.

"I'm not an envious person. I don't worry," he said, noting proudly that he is zayde to five grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

JNF emissary back with his Diaspora 'family'

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Col. (Res.) Yaen Vered

TORONTO — Col. (Res.) Yaen Vered, a 58-year-old veteran of the Israeli army, says he has a "love affair with the Jewish nation" that started in Canada, and that's the reason he has come to Toronto as the new Jewish National Fund (JNF) special Jerusalem emissary.

Vered, a veteran of the Israeli public service, was the British Columbia JNF representative in Vancouver from 1981 to 1985. While there, he says he developed a keen interest in the Diaspora. "Since life is short, I wanted to come back to the Diaspora, to be with my family."

Though he owns two houses in Israel, he says his first choice was to return to Canada to learn more about his fellow Jews in the Diaspora.

Here since Aug. 1, Vered has been up and down the Bathurst Street corridor, seen all the Jewish signs on the shops, which made him feel he was back in Tel Aviv, and has had a chance to talk to many Toronto Jews.

"It is good that Jews here are concerned about spiritual problems and the question of who is a Jew."

Perhaps what is needed, he suggests, is a conference of the elders of the Jewish Nation, "wherever they are – scholars, rabbis, people from every stream of Judaism to help us understand what Judaism is."

Born in Moshav Gan HaShomron, Vered is a specialist in electronics and communication. Just prior to his Toronto posting, he was for three years general director of NITZAN, the Israeli Association for the Advancement of Children and Adults with Learning, Behavioral and Functional Disabilities. He also served as deputy director general of the AMAL Schools and Colleges Network for eight years, directing a budget of $10 million and coordinating more than 500 different courses with an enrolment of 11,000.

Vered credits his Canadian experience with turning him into a Zionist concerned with the problems of Jews everywhere. "To be born in Israel and to be a Zionist is one thing, but for you in the Diaspora to make a decision to be a Zionist is more commendable."

He described as "worried, but not pessimistic" the views of Canadian Jews about Israel. "They are worried about Israeli security, about the attitude of the Israeli government to the Arabs. And I was asked many times about the problems of Jewish continuity."

Vered and his wife, Pnina, have a home in Petach Tikvah. Pnina will join him in their rented condominium at St. Clair Avenue and Yonge Street for the High Holy Days, but will not be able to move to Toronto until the beginning of 1998.

בוקר נשום של אוגוסט, אני נוהג לבית החולים ובחוץ יורד גשם. אני שם את הקלטת החדשה של אריק איינשטיין "לאן פרחו הפרפרים" ומבטיח לעצמי לא לאבד את העשתונות. התקליט נפתח בצלילי החלילים של שם טוב לוי ואני ישר מרגיש שארבעים דקות הבאות תהיינה מיוחדות. אחר כך מתחילים שירים יפים ועדינים, כל אחד ממש יותר תענוג מהשני, אין התחכמות ואין פטנטים. ואני כבר ב downtown ומרגיש שהחזקתי מעמד, ואז פתאום מתחיל השיר "שלום חבר" ותוך דקה אני במקום אחר. הדמעות שלי מתערבבות עם הגשם שבחוץ ואני בקושי רואה ועוצר בצד הדרך כמו בצפירה של יום הזיכרון.

רבבות קל אוהביך
נהרו אל העצרת
נאספו לראות פניך,

עת נבוך סמוק כילד
את קולך בשיר נתת
הגורל נקש בדלת
ואתה כלל לא שמעת

שוב ושוב עובר בי רעד
מי יכול היה לדעת,
מה נאמר ואין מילים פשוטות יותר
שלום חבר.

בעודך טובל באושר
ובשיר שלום פוצח
שם בחושך לשעת כושר
כבר המתין המרצח

הכיכר קולה הומה
לב אל לב נפתח כפרח
אקדחו טעון במוות
ועיניו קרות כקרח...."

את השיר הזה כתב יעקוב רוטבליט, כותב "שיר לשלום", שהיה השיר האחרון ששר יצחק רבין בחייו.

Jewish groups denounce messianic 'synagogue'

poster is in Hebrew. There's a space for children's services, and plans call for a library and offices.

Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group, says City of David is one of many so-called "Hebrew-Christian" groups operating in Toronto, including Jews for Jesus, which target Jews for conversion to Christianity.

City of David is really an evangelical church "disguised" as a synagogue, and is part of the fundamentalist Protestant movement that "aggressively" proselytizes to Jews, says Jews for Judaism executive director Julius Ciss.

The group has issued "an urgent warning to Toronto's Jewish community" about the congregation in its most recent newsletter.

Ciss says the surrounding community should be wary of the congregation. He says messianic groups have successfully reached vulnerable people, like Jewish seniors, recent immigrants and the young, by employing Hebrew and other Jewish trappings in their services.

Fundamentalist Christians contribute millions of dollars toward proselytizing Jews every year, spurred by New Testament teachings, Ciss says.

Asked by The CJN whether the congregation will seek to convert Jews, Forman said: "We have a natural desire to reach Jewish people. Jesus has been rejected by the Jewish people. But one day, he's going to reveal himself as Yeshua, the Jew."

Forman says York Region's burgeoning Jewish population has nothing to worry about: "We're here to be a blessing to the community."

Messianic mailings warning issued

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Jews for Judaism are also warning Toronto Jewry about an apparent increase in random mailings from messianic groups to Jewish homes.

Last week, a number of apartment dwellers in the Bathurst-Steeles area, home to many Russian-Jewish immigrants, reported receiving an eight-page mailing from Jews for Jesus.

Half the mailing was in Russian, with the other half in English. It admonished readers that "it's not too late to be saved" and urged them to recite a prayer "to accept Yeshua in my heart."

The mailing is "a rather odious attempt by evangelical Christians to convert Jews by means of religious fraud," said CJC's Bernie Farber.

Jews for Judaism says Congregation Melech Yisrael on Rainee Avenue also sent out flyers recently, advertising film screenings.

As well, Jewish homes in the Bathurst-Sheppard area reported receiving a letter from the Toronto Jewish Mission on Sheppard, asking them to send away for a free Bible.

Farber said there seems to be a "highly-funded, big push" by Toronto's messianic groups of late, indicating they are gearing up for the year 2000. According to some fundamentalist Christians, Jesus will return that year, but before that, Jews must accept him as messiah. — R.C.

Israeli scouts provide lively entertainment

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mel Lastman Square in North York was alive with the sound of Israeli music, thanks to the recent performance by the Israeli Scout Friendship Caravan, a musical troupe of Israeli scouts.

The 10-member troupe, made up of Israeli teens 16 and 17 years old, was enthusiastically received by the audience, estimated at 1,300. They clapped and sang, and some people even got up on the stage to join the young high-spirited performers.

The Ontario visit of the Friendship Caravan, now in its 25th year, was co-sponsored by the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting and Guiding, Canadian Jewish Congress, and United Israel Appeal.

Robert Engel, chair of the scout advisory committee, was the key organizer of the Ontario concerts also held at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and in Niagara Falls.

The troupe, which toured the United States and Canada for three months, performed a total of 125 concerts at a variety of settings, including summer camps, community centres and synagogues. The North York concert was one of the last stops.

The teens, who rehearsed intensively for three months in Israel, were selected from a delegation of 50 young leaders and counsellors in the Israel Scout Movement chosen to represent Israel from a large pool of applicants.

Those who were not part of the Friendship Caravan became counsellors or leaders in scout camps and Jewish summer camps.

Caravan members told The CJN that the three-month tour was a unique experience.

"It was the best time of my life," said Yoni Amgor, 17. "It's an experience you can have only have once in a life time."

Lilach Birger, also 17, said meeting so many people – they visited 25 U.S. states – was interesting, but the friendships among troupe members was what made the experience so special.

Eran Sinvany said performing was hard work – the troupe often did two concerts a day and on one occasion, four – but he always felt energized by the companionship of other troupe members.

Group leader Dan Helfman said one of the highlights of the trip was participating and performing at a scout jamboree near Richmond, Va., which drew some 45,000 people. President Bill Clinton, the jamboree's keynote speaker gave a special greeting to the Israeli troop, Helfman said.

"He looked surprised when he saw the Israeli flag – I don't think he knew there are scouts in Israeli – and then he said, 'Shalom. Welcome.'"

DRIVE FOR NEW DONORS KICK-STARTS CAMPAIGN '98

UJA Federation's drive to attract new contributors to its annual campaign is shifting into high gear.

Last year more than 3,000 community members joined the UJA Federation family, helping to raise $35.5 million for Jews in need here at home, in Israel and around the world.

Although campaigners are already preparing to contact non-contributors, a special New Gifts telethon on Sunday, September 28 will officially kick-off the effort.

Another York Region telethon will be held at the Promenade Shopping Centre later in the Fall to increase involvement in UJA Federation among the growing number of Jews living north of Steeles.

The campaign for new gifts includes a series of community parlour meetings and a bus mission for grade 7 day school students to get them acquainted with local services and programs funded by UJA Federation.

"The mission is a great way to expose our children to the work of UJA Federation at an age when they can really appreciate what they see," says Gary Grundman, who for the second year, is co-chairing the new gifts effort with Rosanne Ain.

Grundman is also hoping an early start will produce "bigger and better results."

"We're putting new gifts at the forefront of Campaign '98 from the beginning to emphasize its importance," he adds.

"We want to keep the momentum going strong all the way through the campaign," says UJA Federation Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar. "These new contributors will be the backbone and future of UJA Federation."

Ain, who is overseeing the parlour meetings starting in November, says the small gatherings are for "people who want to get involved but don't know where to start."

"Many of the people who attended parlour meetings held during last year's campaign ended up becoming new donors," adds Ain. "It's a real grass roots initiative."

UJA Federation's 1998 Campaign was officially launched last week with leaders emphasizing the community's growing needs.

Government cutbacks have placed more pressure on UJA Federation to fill the gap left by funding decreases.

Campaign officials have identified the alleviation of poverty, the rescue of Jews around the world and the preservation of Jewish identity as this year's important priorities.

If you would like more information on new gifts events, please call (416) 631-5738.

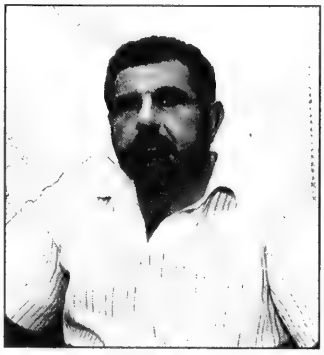
EXODUS SUPERVISOR IN REMOTE REGIONS

TASHKENT - Zvi Kiliman relishes a challenge. The 44 year old head of the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency in what was once Soviet Central Asia oversees the ongoing immigration to Israel of the region's remaining 60 thousand Jews.



Zvi Kiliman

"Nearly three thousand people are studying Hebrew," he says, "and 640 teenagers participated in youth camps during the summer."

Based in Tashkent, Kiliman is responsible for a part of the world which includes Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Tadjikistan, Khyrgizia and Turkmenistan. These former Soviet republics had over 150,000 Jews before 1990 but a mass exodus for Israel has drastically reduced numbers.

Since 1994, about 26,000 Jews have emigrated to Israel, and this year over 4,000 Central Asian Jews are expected.

"Most of the older remaining Jews are reluctant to come to Israel," observes Kiliman. "But their children do not need much persuading. Our informal youth programs stimulate interest in Israel and their Jewish heritage, while our ulpanim teach not only Hebrew but Jewish festivals, Jewish history and Israel as well."

Kiliman was born in Kishniev, Moldova and made aliyah, with his family, when he was 19, in 1972. An engineering graduate from the prestigious Technion, Kiliman served as a professional soldier in the Israel Defence Forces for 20 years, reaching the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. Before assuming his current position in Tashkent, Kiliman served in Baku, Kishniev and Odessa.

While he especially enjoys direct contact with members of the Jewish communities under his jurisdiction, most of Kiliman's time is spent handling logistics over a region spanning thousands of miles.

"In Tashkent we have 20 personnel including five emissaries from Israel", he explains, "while in Alma Ata, in Kazakhstan, we have a similar size office. Then we have dozens of smaller offices throughout the region managed by local coordinators."

Although all the countries of the region are Moslem, anti-semitism has not been a factor motivating immigration.The only exception today is Tadjikistan where the Iranian influence has triggered civil war and political strife.

"The major prejudice that confronts Jews is hatred of Russians by the local Asian population," says Kiliman.

However, political turmoil and economic insecurity are widespread, convincing younger Jews there's no future for them in the area.

MISSION WITH A FAMILY FEELING

The secret for the success of UJA Federation's most recent mission to Israel was all in the family.

Eighty five community members – parents, children and even some grandparents – participated in the eight-day mission, with a customized itinerary that delivered something for everyone.

Aside from all the fun on land, sea and air, including a jeep ride in the Galilee and inner-tubing on the Jordan River, Family Mission members visited Yitzhak Rabin's grave, the Yad Vashem memorial and archeological digs in Tel Morashah.

"It's amazing how much the children absorbed," noted Lori Disenhouse, who chaired the mission with her husband Sheldon and three children. Even though this was the Disenhouse's first family trip to Israel, this one was different. "We never realized how much variety Israel had to offer to the entire family," she said.

Lori's daughter, Sari, was one of five mission participants to celebrate bar and bat mitvahs high atop Masada. "It was such a special moment, not just for us, but for all the families celebrating," recalled Sheldon Disenhouse.

Renee Bal also celebrated her 70th birthday by climbing Masada with her children and grandchildren.

"The trip was special because there was always enough to interest both parents and their kids," said Adam Pivnick, who brought along his wife and two children. "Every day there was something to look forward to."

"Everybody was entertained all the time," observed Eileen Bronstetter. "My kids absolutely loved it."

"There isn't a better way to experience Israel with the entire family than a UJA Federation mission," Disenhouse added.

Israel 'trekers' seek return trip

A group of young adults recently sampled a taste of Israel which left them hungry for more.

Fifteen 25-35 year-old Torontonians, most of them visiting Israel for the first time, participated in UJA Federation's first Israel Trek mission this summer. The program was designed for young adults looking for an alternative to traditional missions.

"We wanted to offer this age group something different," explains Israel Trek Chair Marc Benjamin. "But at the same time we wanted the mission to instill in them a love of Israel that only a first hand experience can do."

In addition to visiting UJA Federation and United Israel Appeal funded Partnership 2000 projects near Eilat, Yad Vashem and Mt. Herzl, the group ventured off the beaten track and even rappelled down a cliff at Mitzpe Ramon in southern Israel. "It was a great ice-breaker," notes Benjamin.

First-timer Robin Nozetz, a 30 year old graphics designer, said she "loved all the physical activity," which included hiking through the Ein Gedi reserve, camping by the foot of Masada, sailing on the Red Sea and kayaking down the Jordan River. "It was five-star all the way," adds Nozetz.

"I developed a whole new appreciation for where UJA Federation dollars go," says Dara Willow. The 27 year old corporate planner, who was also visiting Israel for the first time, said having the Mayor of Eilat welcome them into the region was one of the highlights of her trip. "The warm welcome and special attention we were given made us feel privileged."

"The mission was action-packed, very educational and exciting whether it was someone's first visit or sixth," adds 30 year old life and disability insurance specialist, Bronna Mitgang . "I can't wait to get back."

Washington Fly-In is headline event

Participants on UJA Federation's Washington Fly-In will learn the latest this month about the ongoing Swiss banking controversy.

The Fly-In, Thursday, September 25, will feature a visit to the world renowned Holocaust Museum and a high level briefing by the man leading U.S. investigations into Swiss banks and Jewish assets. Gregg Rickman, Project Director for the United States Senate Banking Committee investigating the use by Swiss banks of funds from Holocaust victims and their families, will address the group at a dinner reception.

Fly-In participants will also be briefed by Aaron Miller, a top American advisor on Middle East affairs, and other senior U.S. government officials.

The one-day visit to the U.S. capital is one of UJA Federation's most popular annual events, which drew 160 community members last year.

"Next to a UJA Federation mission to Israel, the Washington Fly-In is the most exciting mission I've ever been on," says Alan Winer, who is co-chairing the trip with Joel Reitman.

The cost is $525 with a minimum UJA Federation gift of $1,000 per participant.

For more information or to book your seat, call Marc Bookbinder at (416) 631-5703.

LAUNCH LOOKS GREAT FOR '98

The mood was Sky high among more than 1,000 participants at last week's Launch of the 1998 UJA Federation Campaign at the Ford Centre. Canadian recording star Amy Sky was the featured entertainer, with the Israeli singing group Hashavim. But the most important business - raising millions of dollars for Jews in need has just begun.

Gene discovered for colon cancer

Hughes Medical Institute of Johns Hopkins University. The findings appear in the September issue of the journal, Nature Genetics.

The scientists analyzed blood and tissue samples taken from about 1,000 Ashkenazi Jews and concluded that Jews who carry the genetic mutation have double the odds – a 16 to 30 percent chance – of other Ashkenazi Jews of getting colon cancer.

Some in the health field warned of over-estimating the chances of Ashkenazi Jews getting colon cancer, citing initial reports that mutations BRCA1 and BRCA2 conferred a 70 to 80 percent chance of Jews with those genes getting breast cancer.

Those estimates were reduced in more recent studies that put the rate at closer to 50 percent.

This finding marks the third time in as many years that Ashkenazi Jews have been singled out for discoveries about genetic mutations causing potentially fatal diseases. The two other discoveries both revolved around breast cancer genes.

"I have trouble myself figuring out why we keep finding mutations so much in Ashkenazi Jews," said Mark Skolnik, chief scientific officer at Myriad Genetics, a Salt Lake City, Utah, laboratory.

"Why should this happen in Ashkenazim and not other populations? The answer is that we don't understand," he said.

Concern over privacy

"The mystery is not that there's a specific mutation in a specific population. That's to be expected. The mystery is that they're so frequent" among Ashkenazi Jews.

The breast cancer discoveries raise growing concerns about the privacy of genetic test results and the way that information might be used by medical insurance companies and employers to discriminate against those whose genes deem them predisposed toward serious disease.

The colon cancer discovery has prompted the same concerns, but with a twist.

Even if a woman is tested and found to have the breast cancer mutations, there is little she can do. She can change her diet and exercise habits, which can somewhat reduce her chances of being stricken with cancer, but short of having a prophylactic mastectomy – amputating healthy breasts – that is all.

In contrast, colon cancer can be detected very early and in many cases, it can be prevented with periodic colonoscopies.

The test is generally recommended for people over 50 and could become a way for people with the genetic predisposition to monitor the colon starting at an even earlier age.

Brensinger said people with a parent, child or sibling who have the disease are encouraged to have colonoscopies prior to age 50.

Because the ramifications of the discovery have not all been explored, it is not clear yet whether health professionals will encourage genetic testing for all Ashkenazi Jews.

Some see our community as a symbol of wealth

The poor have a different view

Over 20,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto area look at life from below the poverty line. Many of them strongly rely on UJA Federation. That's why UJA Federation provides supplementary financial assistance, housing, clothing, counselling and vocational training for the Jewish poor. The ability to dignify their lives is in your hands. Food, medicine, a Jewish education; any kind of assistance for any Jew in need is at the heart of our sacred responsibility for one people around the world. Please share that responsibility by supporting the UJA Federation Campaign.

Kelman steps down after 38 years at Beth Emeth

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After some 45 years in the rabbinate, Rabbi Joseph Kelman remains an idealist.

"I'm an optimist by nature. I like to see good in everything," said the personable rabbi, who retired as spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue Sept. 1 after 38 years of service.

Rabbi Kelman will continue to be involved in Jewish education and will maintain his involvement with the congregation as rabbi emeritus.

He recently took on the role of educational director of United Congregational Schools of Greater Toronto, the Beth Emeth-based supplementary school he co-founded many years ago.

Despite a long rabbinic lineage, Rabbi Kelman was not initially encouraged to follow family tradition.

"You can work for the community in other ways," he remembers being told by his mother, Mirl, who once led a march to Kensington Market to convince shopkeepers to stop working on Shabbat.

Ensconced in a high-backed armchair behind the cluttered desk in his book-lined study, Rabbi Kelman's eyes twinkled as he said he would have liked to manage the Brooklyn Dodgers.

Kidding aside, he recalled considering a career as a professor of Jewish history. But a lucite-encased baseball signed by Blue Jay Joe Carter, almost smack in the middle of the desk, attests to the rabbi's lifelong interest in baseball.

Whatever path he took, the future rabbi wasn't about to strike out. Taking a positive approach became his personal philosophy.

Shortly after he was hired by the fledgling Beth Emeth congregation in 1959, the rabbi would recruit new members by going door to door in the evenings.

In the greater community, Rabbi Kelman was a co-founder of the Reena Foundation and Shearim Hebrew Day School. In 1964, he was involved in founding the Ezra school, an afternoon religious program for children with learning disabilities which became the precursor of Shearim.

About a year after joining Beth Emeth, Rabbi Kelman received a late evening phone call requesting his services at Queen Street Ontario Hospital (now Queen Street Mental Health Centre).

"My first reaction was, 'It's been a long day,'" he recalled. But he was needed, and he went to offer solace to a Jewish patient who had attempted suicide. "I was scared," he admitted, "but I must have said the right thing."

The experience opened his eyes to the needs of Jews in institutions and helped shaped his philosophy of equal opportunities for all Jews.

In 1962, he became a chaplain at Queen Street, arranging for kosher food and organizing weekly prayer services for patients. Eventually he was asked to become part-time coordinator of chaplaincy services for Ontario and chaplain of the Don Jail.

A prospective member who inquired about bar mitzvah opportunities for a developmentally disabled child provided the impetus for Kadima, a Hebrew school program for children with developmental disabilities.

"I don't think I've been naive, but I certainly think a positive approach can help one be creative and innovative."

A highlight of Rabbi Kelman's career was the establishment of the Rabbi Joseph Kelman Educational Research Centre at Tel Aviv University in 1991. Since then, it has had a number of major conferences.

In honor of the rabbi on his retirement, the congregation has commissioned a Torah and created an endowment fund to assist members with educational endeavors. The year-long project culminates in a Siyyum HaTorah ceremony and gala banquet Nov. 9.

He credits his family – wife Ruth and their three children (two of whom are now rabbis) – as well as his congregation, which has grown to over 1,500 families, for supporting his work and his ideas.

A staunch traditionalist, his family background is chassidic. "[But] I've always maintained we shouldn't be labelling Jews anyway...There's no reason there can't be greater cooperation between rabbis of different movements, especially when there are common concerns. I was brought up to have love for all Jews."

Born in Vienna and raised in Toronto, Rabbi Kelman was one of six children of Rabbi Tzvi Yehuda Kelman. He left for New York at age 17 and was ordained at Yeshiva Rabeinu Yitzchak Elchanan.

He began his career serving congregations in Sherbrooke, Que., New York and Massachusetts before settling back in Toronto.

"He's a very committed individual," said Rabbi Barry Schneider, who succeeds Rabbi Kelman as senior rabbi of the shul. "As he nurtured the congregation, he was also nurturing the community. He [has taken] a very personal interest in members' families and their lives. He was always on call and always available."

Early in his career, Rabbi Kelman decided he didn't want to develop any pompous airs. "I like to be close to the people. I think it's important that a rabbi be a mentsh first and a rabbi second."

For UJA Federation, rescue is more than a cause. It's the bridge between Tashkent and Toronto.

Offering immigrants, regardless of their background, a fresh start represents our responsibility, as Jews to each other.

That's why UJA Federation has helped over 800,000 Jews escape war, crisis and anti-semitism in places like Sarajevo, Chechnya and other parts of the former Soviet Union.

And when they move to Israel we're there as well. At UJA Federation, what we have in common counts for more than what sets us apart.

We believe in one people.

That's how we provide hope for Jews around the world.

Villeneuve compares Irgun, Quebec liberation

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former FLQ terrorist Raymond Villeneuve, who last fall said Jews could face retaliation for working against Quebec independence, recently compared Quebec's national liberation movement to the Irgun freedom-fighters of pre-state Palestine and blamed the anglophone media for portraying him as an anti-Semite.

In the July issue of Vice, a monthly English-language tabloid with a circulation of 60,000 copies that are distributed free of charge across Canada, Villeneuve is quoted as saying that all partitionists "are going to die" and that "if you ask me, I didn't kill enough English. I should have killed more."

At the same time, Villeneuve draws an analogy between the group he founded, the Mouvement de Libération Nationale du Québec (MLNQ), and other liberation forces, including the Basque's ETA, the IRA and the Irgun.

The interview, by Robbie Dylan, quotes Villeneuve as saying that he bears "no specific hatred for 'English Jews' or any other ethnic group."

"Personally, I don't have anything against them," he says.

"If they will respect me, I will respect them, but when they place their interests on the side of the oppressors, they act as enemies of the Quebec people."

Villeneuve blames a "conspiracy" in the anglophone media for his image as an anti-Semite.

"They are always criticizing us, saying we are racist and anti-Semitic.

"They try to demonize the Quebec people so that immigrants will be afraid to vote for Quebec independence."

Last September, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) lodged a complaint of incitement of hatred against Villeneuve with provincial and federal attorneys general and asked Montreal Urban Community police to investigate after his alleged threat against the Jews appeared in his newsletter, La Tempête.

Villeneuve sent the newsletter out to the media on the eve of Yom Kippur and the controversy over its contents erupted the next day all over French- and English-language radio.

To even react to Villeneuve's latest utterings "lends them a credibility they do not deserve," said Jack Jedwab, CJC-Q's executive director.

Comparing the MLNQ to the Irgun is "completely absurd," Jedwab said. "There is no possible comparison between the two."

As for Villeneuve's protestations about not being anti-Semitic, Jedwab considers them "irrelevant."

"Whether he perceives himself that way or not, he made comments that were anti-Semitic and issued threats against the community," Jedwab said.

Villeneuve may think there is a media conspiracy to paint him as anti-Semitic, but "we got his statements from the radio and on tape.

"We couldn't have more tangible evidence. The proof couldn't be more solid."

CJC delivered Judaic content to summer camps

TORONTO — Visitors passing through the rotunda of Toronto's Lipa Green Building for Jewish community services this summer reacted with curiosity and delight on witnessing four young women rehearsing the mystery Who Stole the Degel? (flag) and a re-enactment of the David and Goliath tale.

They were preparing interactive skits for presentation at Jewish and non-Jewish day camps across southern Ontario.

"We wrote these little plays to involve the campers as participants," said Carly Steinman, coordinator of the summer camp project of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region."

Through its community services and youth activities department, CJC has been delivering Judaic content programs to camps, as well as ones on multiculturalism and anti-racism, for 23 consecutive years. CJC offers this program free of charge.

Under the direction of Steinman, 21, the staff included Jocelyn Heisel, 20, and Channa Lockshin, 19. The students' salaries came from a grant from Canada Human Resources Development.

The main goal of the project is to educate and enhance the campers' understanding of Judaism and Israel, said Jennifer Turack, CJC's director of community services and youth activities. "Our program is designed to convey the importance of mitzvot. Programs on Israel emphasize biblical and Zionist heroes, and Israeli pioneers and culture."

Interactive plays

Jay Waxman, director of Camp Kadimah in Hamilton, commenting on the CJC program, said he felt that "it helped instill a greater pride in Judaism and a greater awareness of Israel. The interactive plays really got the kids involved."

Camps visited this year included Bloor JCC, Kidsworld, Earl Bales and Pleasant Junior in Toronto; Lovin'Care in Thornhill; Kids of Canada Hockey Camp in Richmond Hill; Mitzvah in Waterloo; Kadimah in Hamilton; Yonee in Windsor; Reena in Collingwood; Northland in Haliburton; and a community event for St. Catharines-Niagara Falls area Jewish youngsters.

TAU set to hold major conference in Toronto

TORONTO — Authorities on a wide range of issues, from conquering disease through genetic engineering, to the search for peace in the Middle East, will be featured at Tel Aviv University's Third North American Conference in Toronto Sept. 18 to 21.

It's the first time the conference will be held in Canada.

Delegates from as far away as Switzerland, Israel and Brazil will join their colleagues from Canada and the United States.

Slated to attend are Tel Aviv University president Yoram Dinstein and Benno Gitter, chair of the international board of governors.

Guest speaker will be Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel and currently publisher of the Jerusalem Post.

Featured speakers will include former Israeli justice minister David Libai; Prof. Moshe Lazar, who will address the search for Mideast peace; political scientist Michael Keren; and Prof. Abel Schejter, an internationally acclaimed biochemist who will update delegates on progress in treatment of diseases through genetics.

Ethiopian-born MK discusses 'racism'

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The only Ethiopian-born Knesset member and members of the Ethiopian Jewish community here strongly disagreed over the extent of "racism" in Israel towards the black African Jews.

Addisu Messele, the president of the United Ethiopian Jewish Organization, who was elected a Labor MK this year, found considerable opposition to his contention that racism, with regard to the Ethiopians, is confined to "individuals and certain groups" and that Israel "as a society" is not racist or discriminatory. These same people tend to hold prejudices against immigrants generally, he added.

Messele did emphasize that the integration of the Ethiopians has been very difficult and that the Israeli government and, especially the chief rabbinate, have made grievous mistakes with regard to the Ethiopian olim. As a result, the Ethiopians feel they are "second-class."

Because they refused the chief rabbinate's request that they convert, they have problems finding a rabbi in Israel who will marry them, he said.

Members of the audience, however, had serious concerns about the placement of Ethiopian children in religious residential schools, thus isolating them from mainstream society and separating them from their families and customs.

Others rejected Messele's depiction of the Ethiopians as a primitive, Third World people who need a long time to catch up in a Western, technological society. Messele said he expects his people will not be completely integrated for another generation, because "their mentality is difficult to change."

Fled native Gondor

The meeting was organized by Na'amat, which has a chapter of Ethiopian women. Leaders of the small local community were also present. Messele was in Montreal to take part in the Combined Jewish Appeal launch.

Messele, 36, was among the first Ethiopians to arrive in Israel in 1980. He fled his native Gondor and walked through Sudan for 32 days before reaching his destination. He has been employed by the Jewish Agency and Histadrut, acting as a liaison between his community and Israeli officials.

Many of the young Ethiopians are doing well. He noted the high number of Ethiopians in university and in the army, including 62 officers. He also presented himself as an example of the success Ethiopians can achieve in Israel.

But some of the young are not integrating well. They have adopted either the African-American or Jamaican culture and are "neither Israeli nor Ethiopian."

Their parents, however, have had a harder time. Most are poor and their average salary is the minimum wage, or about $700 (US) a month. With families of 10 or 12 children not uncommon, few can afford to give them an education.

Although parents can now send their children to the school they want, the residential religious schools remain popular because they relieve the families' crowded housing and mean fewer mouths to feed, he indicated. However, these schools tend to offer a lower quality of education, he said, and isolate young Ethiopians from the majority of Israelis who attend secular schools.

Vancouver prepares for Israel's 50th

Western Jewish Bulletin

VANCOUVER — Plans for a year-long party in celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary in 1998 are being launched in Vancouver.

"I'm actually very excited about it," said Judy Mandleman, chair of the Jewish community of the Lower Mainland 50th anniversary celebration committee. "It's a wonderful project and time to celebrate," Mandleman said after the first meeting attended by representatives from about 20 Jewish groups.

Some of the diverse events tentatively planned for the celebration, which starts worldwide with the lighting of the first Chanukah candle, include: a program to take events to smaller Jewish communities such as White Rock; speakers; tours of Israel; a series of public debates as well as education programs for both Jewish and public schools; and a theatrical event telling the story of Israeli modern history.

Extravaganza

There are plans for an extravaganza on Yom Ha'atzmaut, which falls next year on June 1, said Mandleman, immediate past president of Hadassah-WIZO of Canada.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver has already given the committee $5,000 in seed money, said executive director Drew Staffenberg. "There will be more," he added. "We want it to be a community-wide celebration."

Federation is also organizing a trip in celebration of Israel's anniversary. The Mission '98 – Israel at 50 Feb. 23 to March 4 trip to Israel is tagged at $2,498. It does not include the cost of getting to Toronto, said Staffenberg.

Travellers must also make a federation campaign contribution of at least $500 over two years. There is room for 1,500 and participants will meet government leaders and tour a number of religious sites.

Keep relationship expectations in check: panel

By BAILA LAZARUS
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — If your marriage, intimate relationship or friendship isn't working out quite like you'd like, it's possible you've been letting your expectations get the better of you.

That's the word from three professionals in the field of counselling and personal growth that came to speak in the Torah and Ethics series at the Lubavitch Centre.

The topic for the evening was Marriages and Relationships: Why some succeed and others fail. Brought together for the panel discussion were Dr. David Freeman, a family therapist and professor in the School of Social Work at the University of British Columbia; Marilee Sigal, clinical director at the Jewish Family Service Agency; and Rabbi Laibl Wolf, a lawyer and dean of the Institute for Jewish Development in Melbourne, Australia.

Rabbi Wolf was on a North American tour lecturing and coordinating workshops on topics such as controlling anger, science and Judaism, time management and uncommon subjects such as Spirituality in the Boardroom.

The issue of expectations set the theme for the evening when Freeman discussed our tendency to project special attributes on people with whom we are in relationships.

"We think we're relating to a person, but those people represent first and foremost metaphors," said Freeman. "They're not really real people to us. They're illusions, myths. They represent things about ourselves we think we need and there are very high expectations that we bring into those relationships."

When those people don't relate in the way their partners were expecting and don't provide the emotional support needed, their partners end up feeling betrayed and hurt, Freeman explained. The resulting effect is that one partner ends up trying to change the other to become what they want. The answer, instead, Freeman suggested is for people to try to change themselves.

"We have to learn far more creative ways to deal with emotional fear," Freeman explained, "to deal with hurt, to deal with disappointment."

Sigal agreed. "In the beginning we're more inclined to ignore differences," she said, adding that often people want to prove to the world they can overcome differences, such as within an intermarriage.

"Over time we can't continue to defer to other people around the things that we need," said Sigal. "We begin to feel like we're disappearing."

Though having differences in a relationship is normal, "it's in the ways couples manage their differences that will predict happiness or misery," said Sigal. To do that, people have to drop the myth of what a perfect couple should be and develop skills needed to listen to and communicate with their partner on a realistic level. "These are just skills like any other skills that can be learned," said Sigal.

Bringing the topic to a more spiritual level, Rabbi Wolf addressed the fundamental issues of how we get to know the people we are involved with.

"To know something is to internalize it," he said. "To really know something is to make it a part of self, and the other and self merge into a oneness." This can only be achieved, said Rabbi Laibl, in a spirit of humility.

But this humility does not imply turning the other cheek, according to Rabbi Wolf. "It includes assertiveness because it includes recognition of our giftedness," he explained. "But at the same time it means to confer that giftedness at the right time to the right person."

In cases of conflict, humility requires certain steps be taken to achieve understanding. "The initial step means withdrawal, step backwards, create a comfort zone for the other one to step into," Rabbi Wolf said. "What I'm doing is not focussing on the self, I'm focussing on the other."

The other aspect to a successful relationship, Rabbi Wolf suggested, is commitment – the ability for two people to stay in love even if they stop loving each other.

Campus life out of town may have its advantages

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto Jewish students who go to university out of town are generally "more than pleased" with their decision, Prof. Paul Socken said last week.

Speaking at the Thornhill Community Centre at an event co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region and UJA Federation, the University of Waterloo faculty member addressed issues faced by Jewish students on "small" campuses. (Although the University of Waterloo is Ontario's fourth-largest university, it has a relatively small Jewish population.)

Socken, chair of Waterloo's Department of French Studies and a former liaison between Kitchener's Beth Jacob Congregation and Waterloo's Jewish Students' Association, outlined what students can expect on campuses with small Jewish student populations. "For one thing," he said, "You are going to meet people who never met a Jew."

Some of the questions Jewish students have encountered from their non-Jewish peers are, "Why don't you believe in Jesus?" and "What do you do in synagogue?"

Paul Socken

Pearl Gropper Berman

Among the difficulties he mentioned were the occasional anti-Semitic incident and trying to find kosher food. Putting up a mezuzah in residence or rescheduling exams that conflict with Jewish holidays is not an issue, he said.

"Jewish student associations are small," he noted, "and can't separate into Orthodox, Conservative and Reform, so people have to learn to get along together and find a way to function on a personal level and at gatherings."

The best news, according to Socken, is that "Jewish boys do meet Jewish girls, they do go out, and even marriages have resulted." Students Cari Ross and Ari Magder, who were representing Queen's University Hillel, approached Socken after his talk to tell him they met at Queen's University Hillel and are engaged to be married next year.

Socken mentioned that much combined programming exists among smaller Jewish student organizations. Last year, for example, McMaster, the University of Guelph, Waterloo, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier University had a joint Chanukah party.

The University of Waterloo, which has a reciprocal program with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, is developing a Jewish Studies program and has annual guest speakers on Judaica. Socken is chair of the dean's advisory committee on Jewish Studies.

Among the campuses represented at the event were McMaster, Queen's University, Sir Wilfrid Laurier University, Trent University (which has an estimated 40 Jewish students) and the University of Western Ontario. An open house, with representatives from the various student associations, preceded the speakers.

Pearl Gropper Berman, director of York University's Jewish Student Federation (JSF), spoke about Jewish identity on a big campus.

Both JSF and its umbrella organization, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, provide "multiple gateways" for interested students.

The JSF offers a women's caucus, an environmental caucus and programming for a variety of Jewish denominations. There is also a campus-based Jewish literary publication.

"We're really trying to say to the student, 'Where are you at? How can we try and involve you?'" said Gropper Berman. "There's a lot of diversity and a lot of options."

Orthodox students threaten to sue Yale

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Jeremy Hershman can't live in a Yale dormitory. It's not that he doesn't want to; his religious beliefs prevent it. The 19-year-old from Cedarhurst, N.Y., has repeatedly told Yale officials that his Orthodox Jewish convictions are not compatible with the mixed-sex atmosphere of dormitory life.

But Hershman, who is set to enter his sophomore year when school opens next week, is in a bind.

Yale housing policy requires that all freshmen and sophomores live on campus unless they are married or over 21 years old.

Hershman and four of his schoolmates have threatened to sue Yale if the university does not change its policy.

For its part, Yale has threatened disciplinary action if the students do not live on campus.

But this has not deterred the two sophomores and three freshmen who have decided that come next week, they will be living off campus, paying thousands of dollars for rooms they will not use.

"Yale permits and often encourages a lifestyle in the dormitories that there's no way a fully observant Orthodox Jew can live in," Hershman said in a recent telephone interview from his home.

He said he will live with two Orthodox graduate students near campus and will pay $7,000 to Yale for room and board in addition to his rent this year.

Last year, when they were entering freshmen, the school had assured Hershman and Lisa Friedman, another Orthodox Jewish student, that a single-sex dorm would accommodate their concerns.

But when Hershman arrived on campus, he said, he found bathrooms that were used by both men and women.

He also attended a freshman orientation lecture that included a speech on how to politely ask your roommate to leave "when you want to have sex with your partner," he recalled.

He never slept in the dorm.

"The obligation to exercise care and modesty in living accommodations so as not to permit even inadvertent inappropriate encounters between men and women is a long-standing rule of Jewish religious observance," Nathan Lewin, an attorney, recently wrote to the dean of Yale College, Richard Brodhead.

"Their religious convictions forbid them from residing in dormitories that are readily accessible to members of the opposite sex for extended periods of time, including overnight visits," Lewin said of the students.

Problems with housing policy

After the university received Lewin's letter, which threatened legal action, Yale's general counsel called Lewin.

"He kept impressing on me that this is an important policy of Yale, to have kids live in dormitories," said Lewin, who said he knew of no similar problem at any other university.

Tom Conroy, deputy director of public affairs at Yale, said that Yale places much emphasis on small residential communities, which include libraries and dining services, as the centre of student life.

Conroy said that such living is an "integral and important" part of attending Yale.

He said the university is open to discussing a solution for the students that would not involve living off-campus.

Hinting that Yale might drop its threat to discipline the students, he added that the college does not conduct bed checks.

For Lewin, a prominent Washington attorney who has frequently represented Orthodox Jews in discrimination claims, this is a simple case of "religious discrimination."

Lewin vowed to file a lawsuit if Yale does not change its policy.

So far, Yale is not budging.

In an exchange of letters in the spring between Friedman and the college's dean of students, Betty Trachtenberg, the school's position was made clear.

"Rather than addressing the religious concerns expressed by the few students," Friedman wrote to Trachtenberg, "you said that students with those religious views should not have sought admission to Yale.

In a terse response dated June 17, Trachtenberg wrote, in part, "We will do everything to make residential college living not only acceptable, but pleasurable to you.

"After consultation with many members of the community who care very deeply about Yale's educational philosophy, one that includes the importance of the residential colleges as a force in a Yale education, I must again deny your request to live off-campus."

Lewin was particularly put off by another comment Trachtenberg wrote to Hershman.

"I personally know many Orthodox Jewish students who live in the residential colleges throughout their four years at Yale and have done so without compromising their religious practices and beliefs," she wrote.

In his letter to Brodhead, Lewin wrote that Trachtenberg's observation about other Orthodox Jews "does not diminish the validity of the religious principle that is at stake."

For his part, Hershman is still hoping that Yale will change its mind.

"I love it there," he said. "It's unfortunate this is happening."

A child's Jewish education is most valuable investment

By CILIA BASIN

All parents hope for and dream of the best future for their children. We all want to give them the best food and clothes, the best health care and the best education we can find.

Guest Voices

I want to tell you about my family. We came from the former Soviet Union, where for generations Jews were discriminated against physically and spiritually. We never had a Jewish school; we didn't know Jewish history and traditions. The only reminders we had that we were Jewish were the word "Jew" on our passports and the people around us who kept telling us who we were.

When we came to Canada, we registered our kids in public school without thinking of their future education. We didn't have any Yiddishkeit, although we went to the synagogue for Yom Kippur and ate matzah on Passover.

Our oldest daughter went back to Israel, where we had lived before we came to Canada, and became a baalat tshuvah. It was a shock for the whole family. First we thought she was crazy. But then we saw how many people around us live in a Jewish way and we wondered if so many people could be crazy?

We started to go to synagogue and read books and we tried to understand why more and more people around us were starting to live a Jewish life. One by one, we began to do some of the mitzvot: We koshered the kitchen, put up mezuzot on the doors, began to light candles, gave tzedakah.

We registered our other daughter, then 10 years old, in a part-time Jewish school that had just opened the doors to Jewish Russian children who were going to public schools. The school was part of the program at the Jewish Russian Community Centre.

When she finished Grade 7, our daughter decided she wanted to go to a Jewish day school. And when she graduated from Grade 8, we registered her in a Jewish high school from which she graduated this year.

In September, my daughter is going to Israel to continue her Jewish education at a women's seminary.

Our family went through good changes

Our family went through big changes, good changes. Our daughter learned a lot of good things, which she passed along to us. She became a volunteer at Baycrest Centre and on Saturdays, she visited the sick at Branson Hospital. Her life was filled with important and meaningful things. We grew together with her.

We experienced real happiness when we visited our older daughter and our 3-year-old granddaughter in Israel last year. It was the first time our granddaughter got to know us.

During the three weeks we were there, she taught us many important things, including to say the blessing over food. It seemed weird to us for a 3-year-old to teach her grandparents. But maybe it is not weird, just very, very sad.

When we came back from Israel, we started to go to the synagogue on Saturdays and holidays. We started to take Judaism classes on Sundays.

We had our eyes opened, learned a lot and got straight answers to most of our questions. We experienced real Jewish nachas thanks to our children.

People invest in different things. Some invest in homes and businesses, bonds or stocks. But I think the most important investment is in our children's education. The interest you receive from that investment is more valuable than anything else.

A while ago I was very confused. But we grew to understand how important it is to give our children what we didn't have – a Jewish education, how important it is that our children and grandchildren will live a Jewish life, that they will be proud to be Jewish.

Every Jew has inside him a "Jewish spot." This "Jewish spot" always helps a Jew make a right decision. And when the decision is made, G-d always helps.

Cilia Basin is a mother and grandmother who lives in Toronto.

Four IDF soldiers die in ambush in Lebanon

Fierce brushfire claims casualties

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Four IDF soldiers were burned to death and six others wounded, three seriously, when caught in the middle of a fierce brushfire last week following a gunbattle in south Lebanon.

An IDF spokesperson identified three of the soldiers killed as St.-Sgt. Oshri Schwartz, 19, from Or Akiva; St.-Sgt. Oren Zarif, 21, from Herzliya; and Sgt. Shimon Yadag, 21, from Sderot.

The wounded were treated in the field once the flames died down and rescuers could reach them. They were later evacuated to Haifa's Rambam Hospital and Rebecca Sieff Hospital in Tzfat.

One soldier was reported in critical condition and two others were said to have sustained serious injuries. Three were moderately hurt.

OC Northern Command Maj. Gen. Amiram Levine appointed Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, assistant to the head of operations, to investigate what happened.

The catastrophe occurred in the afternoon after a clash between troops from a Golani Brigade unit and a squad from the Amal Shiite movement.

The troops had been on ambush duty in a thickly vegetated valley known as Wadi Hujuar west of Kanatra village on the border of the security zone in the eastern sector.

The Golani soldiers apparently took the Amal squad by surprise and opened fire at the gunmen, killing four. A fifth squad member was reportedly wounded but managed to escape.

There were no casualties among the IDF troops as a result of the gunfight, but they stayed in place as fighting continued in the area.

Hezbollah claimed in a statement from Beirut that its fighters joined the battle later and opened fire with machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades.

There were no casualties among the soldiers from the gunfight, but support units were called into action and began pounding the area with mortars and artillery fire.

IAF helicopter gunships also went into action strafing the ground, apparently to ensure there were no more gunmen around.

A blaze broke out in the area and quickly spread. It is not clear whether the brush fire was caused by the "friendly fire" or by rounds fired by gunmen.

A statement by the IDF said that "an IDF force in action in the central sector of the security zone spotted a terrorist squad in the early afternoon. The force opened fire killing four terrorists.

"During the clash there was light arms fire and fire from helicopter gunships. In the area of the clash a brushfire erupted as a result of the shooting and heavy winds propelled the fire towards the IDF force. The soldiers detected the approaching fire and tried to extricate themselves but the fire caught up with them and caused the death of four soldiers, and six were injured," the statement said.

Levine said the brushfire was apparently caused by artillery fire.

News agencies reported that the fire broke out as a result of IDF fire. It said that the blaze spread quickly engulfing four soldiers, who were killed, and then setting off ammunition they were carrying, seriously injuring two other soldiers.

One wounded soldier described the ordeal to a reporter at Rambam Hospital, where he was brought along with three others burned in the blaze.

"We were on the slopes of a hillside with another hill opposite. The terrorists that we killed were in a crevice," said Cpl. Ronen Laloush, 20, of Upper Nazareth.

"We fought them for about four hours and killed four of the terrorists. The fifth managed to get away.

"The battalion knew about the place and started to fire mortars to make certain the terrorists had been wiped out. One of the mortars started a fire on the hill opposite. All the area is covered in scrub and bushes," Laloush said.

Laloush said the troops remained in position even though the opposite hillside was ablaze. "Then a strong wind started blowing in our direction.

"We didn't really notice at first what was happening. When we did, the fire was right below us and spreading rapidly upwards," he said.

He said the fire by then was spreading at a rate of 20 metres a minute, with flames shooting into the air. The troops received orders to climb out of the wadi and took off their heavy equipment to make it easier.

Laloush said there was choking, heavy smoke everywhere. "We started to have the jitters at the scene as the fire reached us and we began to burn," he said.

"I didn't think we would get out of there. The flames were as high as eight metres. It was frightening.

"I started to climb up, but it was impossible to breathe or see. We shouted our names to one another." Laloush said that at one stage he looked back to see what was happening to his comrades and felt a finger of flame reach out to him.

"I put up my hands to cover my face and they got burned and lost all feeling in them. I climbed up on my hands and knees as best I could.

"We reached the top and then the unit commander and myself turned back, when the flames had passed, and went back down about 20 or 30 metres in order to help our comrades.

"It was terrible. They were all burned. We couldn't help because of the fire and the heat. It was horrible," he said.

During the fighting, IAF warplanes struck at Hezbollah targets in the Jabal Shaffi region in the eastern sector of south Lebanon, north of the security zone.

The army spokesperson said the pilots reported direct hits and that all the planes returned safely to their bases.

Reports from Lebanon said the jets fired air-to-ground missiles at a deserted house apparently used by Hezbollah gunmen as a launching pad for attacks and infiltrations into Israel's security zone.

There were no immediate reports of any Hezbollah casualties in the air raid the 10th by the IAF against targets in Lebanon in the past month although reports from Lebanon said the building was destroyed.

Claims conference draws fire over German properties

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany has called a board meeting in New York City for Sept. 10, following allegations that it has abused its mandate.

Formed in 1951 by 23 major Jewish organizations to channel German reparation funds to Holocaust survivors, the conference took the decision at an executive committee meeting in Jerusalem on July 3.

As a result of a cover story in.the May 15 edition of the Jerusalem Report, the conference will examine "serious basic issues" about its policy on unclaimed Jewish property in Germany.

"The policy will be reviewed," George Berman, a New York-based communications consultant retained by the conference, told The CJN in an interview.

The Jerusalem Report charges that the conference, with branches in New York, Frankfurt and Tel Aviv, is blocking attempts by rightful heirs to lay claim to properties worth a fortune in now defunct East Germany.

The conference, whose net assets last year were $88 million (US), denies the accusation.

The roots of the current controversy are bound up with the collapse of the Communist regime in East Berlin and the subsequent reunification of Germany in 1990.

With the amalgamation of West and East Germany, the conference entered into negotiations with the German government to ensure that property that had been seized by the Nazis and the Communists in the eastern part of the country would be returned to their original Jewish owners. The conference made claims on some 75,000 properties.

Properties sold on open market

It was agreed that Jewish properties unclaimed by heirs by the end of 1992 would be transferred to the conference.

The conference, in turn, would sell them on the open market and channel the proceeds to institutions around the world, including those in Canada, which offer Holocaust education programs and provide shelter and social services to needy Holocaust survivors.

"We sold the properties as fast as possible to aid the survivors," explained Berman. "We're not sitting on this money. We make two rounds of allocations a year."

According to the Jerusalem Report, the conference has so far reaped $150 million (US) from the sale of properties.

In a statement submitted to The CJN, Rabbi Israel Miller, president of the conference, maintains that "we are the owners, not [the] trustees," of these properties.

Rabbi Miller also said that nearly $100 million (US) has been allocated since 1996 for programs of assistance for survivors.

In 1994, the conference established the Goodwill Fund to accommodate heirs who had missed the 1992 deadline. Last year, the fund had assets of $20 million (US). It is continually replenished by the sale of properties.

To discourage so-called "inheritance chasers," the conference, in 1996, decided that it would terminate the Goodwill Fund on Dec. 31, 1997. But recently, the conference was urged to extend the deadline by one year.

When a claim is adjudicated under the terms of the Goodwill Fund, the conference takes a 10 percent administrative cut and shares in the net profits.

"Depending on the value of the property, Goodwill claimants may be entitled to up to 100 percent of the net proceeds," said Rabbi Miller in a press release.

But according to the conference's spokesperson, the average claimant receives about 47 percent of the value of the property. He said that 30 percent of claims already have been settled. "We might clear up all claims by 2000," he added.

Critics such as New York academic Howard Adelson accuse the conference of being arrogant and greedy. In a recent column in the Jewish Press, published in New York City, Adelson writes: "By its own fiat, the...conference has become the heir of all those survivors and their heirs who are denied their rightful compensation."

Adelson adds that the conference "has failed miserably in its purpose of assisting victims of the Holocaust and their heirs to secure justice."

Assisting Holocaust victims

Critics also contend that the conference has no right to demand a split of the net proceeds from property sales, that it should act like a trustee rather than an owner and that it should not rush to scrap the Goodwill Fund. These issues will dominate the Sept. 10 meeting.

Since its creation 46 years ago, the conference – which was founded by the late president of the World Jewish Congress, Nahum Goldmann – has negotiated agreements with Germany worth about $50 billion (US) at current exchange rates. These payments have gone to individual Holocaust survivors throughout the western world.

By Rabbi Miller's reckoning, 60 percent of the proceeds from the sale of unclaimed Jewish properties in eastern Germany have been allocated to Israeli institutions which help survivors and further the cause of Holocaust education,

In the former Soviet Union, the conference works closely with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee to assist survivors who did not receive German reparation payments during the Communist era.

In Canada, the conference makes allocations to social service agencies, notably the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto, B'nai Brith, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Jewish Support Services for the Elderly in Montreal.

Australia, home to the highest percentage of Holocaust survivors, gets funding for senior day care centres, homecare and related services.

As well, the conference supports Christian rescuers of Jews (Righteous Gentiles), and has made major grants to Yad Vashem in Jerusalem and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

Among the member organizations of the conference are Canadian Jewish Congress, American Zionist Federation, World Jewish Congress, World Union of Progressive Jewry, Jewish Agency for Israel, Council of Jews in Germany, American Jewish Committee and the Board of Deputies of British Jews.

Israel's hi-tech capacity is uncertain if not nonexistent.

Korea's industrial conglomerates are opening trade offices in Israel, its entrepreneurs are entering joint ventures with Israelis and its citizens are keen on visiting Israel.

Despite Netanyahu's argument that the Arab oil-producing states no longer can corner the international oil market, or impose another oil embargo and are comparatively static consumers compared to Israel's burgeoning yen for imports, traditional policies are slow to change in Tokyo.

Perhaps the prime minister's sales pitch was a bit too shrill for Japanese ears. Perhaps his hastily arranged itinerary seemed incomplete without the customary call on the emperor (he was away on vacation) and without the reassuring presence of their foreign minister (he was abroad).

But had Netanyahu waited one more year for Japan to be able to grant him one of the four annual official visits budgeted for foreign heads of government, there would have been no chance of his potential business partners attending the Prime Minister's Economic Conference in November 1998.

The prime minister evidently decided that the opportunity to pay an official visit to Korea justified a bold foray into Japan as well, even if the level of protocol was lower than the Japanese might have preferred.

His prognosis of future events in Israel, which is not necessarily shared with the news media, may have prompted him to go while the going was still good. As for China, how much can be expected from an airport stopover? It may have been the harbinger of a much more elaborate visit at a later date.

Above all, Netanyahu managed to get his main message across to all three Asian interlocutors: that Iran's attempt to become a nuclear power and acquire deadly ballistic missiles must be thwarted not only for the sake of Israeli security, but also in the interest of world peace. His warnings evidently did not fall on deaf ears in Beijing, Tokyo and Seoul.

The Week in Israel

Aug. 25

• Speaking at a news conference in Japan, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross would soon return to the region to check whether Yasser Arafat was fulfilling his pledge to fight terrorism. At the same conference, Japan's Prime Minister Rytaro Hashimoto called on Israel to ease sanctions imposed on the Palestinian Authority.

Aug. 26

•Lt. Gen. Amnon Shahak told the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee that he did not think an explosion of violence was imminent in the territories.

• The daily newspaper, Ha'aretz announced plans to publish a four-page English language supplement in September to be inserted in the International Herald Tribune.

Aug. 27

• Israel lifted the internal closure it had imposed on Bethlehem. The closure between Israel and the West Bank and Gaza Strip remained in effect.

• Israel arrested a Druze woman in the Golan Heights on charges that she spied for Syria.

• An Israeli court allowed the publication of the news that earlier this month Israel had arrested, Nadia Fudah, an Israeli woman on suspicion that she spied for Iraq.

Aug. 28

• Media reported that Israel and Jordan would soon sign an agreement to open an airport in the Jordanian town of Aqaba. The Aqaba airport will eventually divert all international flights from Eilat.

• Netanyahu said Israel was not committed to withdrawing from the Golan Heights in order to make peace with Syria.

Aug. 29

• The Histadrut Teachers Union announced that it would strike on the first day of classes if school hours were not restored and if some 12,000 teachers are not returned to work.

Arafat's dual policy

'The kiss of death'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Much to Israel's indignation, Yasser Arafat recently embraced and kissed the leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, while refusing to clamp down on their terrorist infrastructure in the Palestinian autonomous areas.

Mideast Analysis

Arafat's gesture to the rejectionists, combined with his defiant refusal to resume full security cooperation with Israel, occurred three weeks after two still unidentified Hamas suicide bombers killed 14 Israelis in Jerusalem.

Last week, Benjamin Netanyahu warned Arafat that his " national dialogue" with Palestinian forces opposed to a peaceful accommodation with Israel may have doomed the tottering Oslo peace process with " the kiss of death."

Arafat has ignored Netanyahu's admonition. Taking a calculated risk, he has cozied up to the likes of Hamas activist Abdel-Aziz Rantisi, who, together with 400 other Islamic fundamentalists, was temporarily banished to southern Lebanon in December 1992.

Despite the PLO's historic rapprochement with Israel, consummated four years ago this week in Washington, Arafat has steadfastly resisted Israeli demands to deal with terrorism once and for all. Nor, judging by his recent meetings with his political rivals, has he abandoned efforts to smooth over yawning divisions in the Palestinian camp.

Basically, as Shin Bet chieftain Ami Ayalon has observed, Arafat is playing a carrot-and-stick game with Palestinians who want to wreck the Oslo accords. In the aftermath of the 1996 suicide bombings, he cracked down on Hamas and Islamic Jihad, jailing their leaders, closing their offices and removing their sympathizers from mosques. But within months of this sweep, he lifted some of the restrictions.

Arafat's strategy, to which he has hewed regardless of the ideological complexion of Israel's government, is based on several considerations. The most important of these is avoidance of a Palestinian civil war and the furtherance of Palestinian unity through the co-option of opponents, be they religious or secular.

With the virtual breakdown of his relationship with Netanyahu, the suspension of the peace process, the closure of the territories, the punitive economic sanctions Israel has imposed on the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the charges of rampant corruption levelled against his administration, Arafat has additional reasons to try to rally Palestinians under his banner.

Arafat, who flinches at the thought of being perceived as an Israeli collaborator, has been assiduously courting Hamas and, to a lesser extent, Islamic Jihad, for at least the past two years. He knows full well that their constituents represent a sizeable chunk of Palestinian opinion, which has hardened under the impact of Netanyahu's settlement policies and his aversion to a Palestinian state.

Arafat began the effort in January 1996, when he supposedly won a pledge from Hamas not to launch attacks against Israel from Palestinian towns in Area A of the West Bank. In March 1996, Arafat convinced Islamic militants formerly associated with Hamas to form a new political party that rejects violence. Six months ago, he apparently persuaded Hamas to support the PA in final status talks with Israel, negotiations which should have begun in May 1996.

Arafat's policy has essentially failed because the Islamic fundamentalists whose backing he seeks have not given up their dream of destroying Israel. "Islam," Rantisi has said, " does not permit giving up one inch of Palestine."

The imprisoned leader of Hamas, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, takes a more conciliatory view, having suggested that "there can be peace" if Israel returns to its pre-Six Day War borders and permits the Palestinians to establish a state with East Jerusalem as its capital.

Yassin, however, no longer expresses the yearnings of most Hamas sympathizers. Out of the loop, he has been superseded by Islamic radicals such as Rantisi, who is far less likely to accede to Arafat's conception of peace.

Missile malfunction won't slow deployment

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The first deployment of the Arrow anti-missile defence system will take place in late 1998 or early 1999 as scheduled, despite the recent failure of an Arrow 2 test launch due to a malfunction, officials said last week.

"We see no reason to change our plans," said Uzi Rubin, head of the anti-missile defence project, called Choma (wall). "The partial deployment will be at the end of 1998 or early 1999 and we hope to stand by this schedule," he said.

Rubin and other officials involved in the Arrow project held a news conference at the Defence Ministry to discuss the failed launch, in which the Arrow 2 missile went out of control seconds after it was fired toward a target missile. The Arrow 2, launched in the Mediterranean, was destroyed in mid-flight to prevent it from veering toward population centres.

The Arrow 2 was to have undergone six test launches, according to the joint U.S.-Israel program. Officials said the partial emergency deployment of the system was to have begun after the sixth and final test, scheduled for early next year.

Uzi Eilam, head of the Defence Ministry's research and development unit, said Arrow program engineers would correct the malfunction before the next test.

"We have enough time to conduct research, enough time to perform simulation," he said. Privately, the engineers said they hope to combine the goals of two tests into the next launch.

"We hope we don't have to go back to the drawing board," said Yair Ramati, Arrow program engineer for Israel Aircraft Industries, the $1.6-billion project's chief contractor.

"We will have a system that can deter," Eilam said. "When we talk of partial capability, we are talking about the capability of destroying another missile. The number of missiles that we have will accumulate over time."

Officials said that, despite the subject's being raised during Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's tour of the Far East, the Arrow program is not seeking additional partners. Both Japan and South Korea have expressed interest in acquiring anti-missile defence capability.

"If we have other countries enter Arrow, it will be with the full coordination of the United States," Eilam said. Everything we do will be done together."

Albright gets set to visit Mideast to aid peace process

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright will travel to the Middle East next week in a bid to prod the Israeli-Palestinian peace process forward.

Albright will visit Syria during her first visit to the region since assuming office, an Israeli Embassy official said, adding that Jerusalem believes that she can be helpful in trying to restart talks that were suspended a year and a half ago.

The United States will officially announce Albright's travel schedule Friday, he said.

"It's a very good idea," the official said of Albright's stop in Damascus. "You have to do something for there to be talks. We want to speak with the Syrians. If we need the Americans' help to do so, that's okay."

Albright also is expected to meet with Jordan's King Hussein and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. But the five-day visit to the region will be dominated by meetings with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat.

In a major policy speech here last month, Albright said she would visit the region at the end of August if she judged there to be sufficient progress on security cooperation between Israel and the PA.

At the time, she criticized the PA for withholding security cooperation as leverage and not taking sufficient steps to suppress terrorism. Albright also rebuked Israel over Har Choma, saying it was undermining mutual trust by taking steps to predetermine the outcome of final-status talks.

U.S. officials have been reserved in evaluating the PA's performance since a trilateral committee was established during U.S. special Middle East coordinator Dennis Ross' visit to the region earlier last month. They have not said whether the PA's performance has improved enough to justify the yardstick Albright set down in her speech.

Albright's trip also appears to signal a return to Netanyahu's good graces of ambassador to the U.S. Eliyahu Ben-Elissar. The envoy will return to Israel for Albright's visit, as protocol dictates. The Israeli official added that Ben-Elissar will be returning early enough to participate in the government's planning sessions in advance of Albright's arrival.

He has been seen by many administration officials and Israeli diplomats here as being out of the loop in both Jerusalem and Washington.

He returned to Israel in late May to secure his position here.

Ben-Elissar met with Ross last week prior to leaving town for a California vacation and is due back this weekend. He will hold additional meetings with Ross this week.

Unity in Basel

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BASEL, Switzerland — Jewish unity was the theme 100 years ago when Jewish delegates convened here to adopt a unified call for a Jewish homeland in Palestine.

Unity was again a theme last week at ceremonies marking the centennial of the First Zionist Congress.

Avraham Burg, chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel and the World Zionist Organization, told the approximately 1,700 delegates attending the ceremonies that Jewish unity is still crucial, even though the dream of Theodor Herzl and his colleagues was realized with the creation of the state of Israel.

Burg called for a "reform" in religious attitudes that "would enable Jews to live among Jews as equals despite the differences between each other."

His comments came at a time of increasing tension between Orthodox and liberal Jews over pending conversion legislation in Israel that liberal Jews believe will delegitimize their beliefs.

Basel served as host for numerous events linked to the centennial celebrations, which concluded with a formal ceremony on Sunday night, on same the date and in the same hall where Herzl concluded the first congress.

Obstacle overcome for Swiss payment to survivor fund

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERN — The Swiss Parliament's legal committee has determined that the Swiss National Bank does not need parliamentary approval to contribute $70 million (US) to a fund for Holocaust survivors.

The 12-5 decision last week countered the bank's long-standing position that such approval would be necessary.

The committee's vote "creates a new situation," said bank spokesperson Gabriel Juri. "We will have to discuss this issue with the government."

According to sources involved in the approval process, the parliament will agree with the committee's decision when it convenes for its fall session. (The parliament is expected to take up the issue by the end of September or early October.)

At that point, the bank can immediately make the contribution to the Holocaust Memorial Fund, Lili Nabholz, the head of the legal committee, said in an interview.

"This is a good day for the Jewish people," said Thomas Lyssy, vice-president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland. "We are optimistic that this money will be paid into the fund within the next few weeks."

The Holocaust Memorial Fund, valued at about $116 million, was created in February with contributions from Switzerland's largest private banks and industrial firms to help Holocaust survivors.

The long-awaited Swiss National Bank contribution would significantly augment the fund, which is expected to begin making payments to survivors soon.

In its decision, the legal committee said the central bank's contribution to the fund, far from being a humanitarian "gift," should be viewed as restitution for the guilt the bank brought upon itself when it purchased millions of dollars of Nazi gold during World War II.

The central bank "did not ask for parliamentary approval when they did their questionable business with the Nazis," said Nabholz. "So why do they need our approval now?"

The committee reached its decision after holding a one-day hearing that involved legal experts, members of the central bank's board of directors and historian Jean-Francois Bergier.

Bergier is chair of the Independent Commission of Experts, the international panel of historians created by Switzerland last December to study the extent of the country's financial dealings with the Nazis.

According to sources within the legal committee, Bergier said the central bank's wartime dealings with the Nazis were indefensible from a moral point of view – particularly after 1943, when it was clear that the gold being purchased by the bank had been looted by the Nazis from the central banks of occupied countries.

Swiss National Bank officials have been loath to admit that their predecessors were guilty of financing the Nazi war effort via purchases of gold from the Reichsbank.

The central bank has a "rather imperfect knowledge of its own history," Jean-Pierre Roth, the vice chairman of the bank's governing board, said in an interview earlier this year. "We are not in a position to answer" all the questions about the bank's wartime actions.

Indeed, Roth defended those actions, saying they were part of the "national defense effort" and that the bank's activities were "directed at maintaining public confidence in the country's currency."

He also explained at the time that parliamentary approval for the bank's contribution to the Holocaust fund was necessary because the bank "has the authority to set monetary policy. It does not have the right to spend any of its reserves without governmental approval."

But in at least one instance this was not the case: Some 20 years ago, the central bank purchased the five-star Hotel Bellevue in the capital of Bern, spending millions of dollars without parliamentary approval.

A parliamentary vote of approval, which now appears unnecessary, could have sparked calls for a national referendum on the issue.

Given the climate in Switzerland, which has been reeling from international criticism over the wartime actions of its government and banking officials, it is not at all clear that the central bank's contribution would have been approved in a referendum.

UJA mission to bring the disabled to Israel

NEW YORK — United Jewish Appeal (UJA) campaigns in Canada and the United States are teaming up for a first-ever mission to Israel for the physically disabled.

The Ometz Mission from New York, Nov. 4 to 14, is designed for people aged 25 to 45 who use manual or power wheelchairs, scooters, walkers or canes. "Slow walkers" are also welcome.

Cost is $3,100 (US) per person, based on double occupancy, and includes round trip airfare, hotel and meals.

Mission chair Dawn Kellman of New York found herself pitching UJA the idea of a special trip to Israel after surveying the market and finding nothing for people like her.

"There wasn't much out there," recalls Kellman, who became a paraplegic and was confined to a wheelchair after injuring her back in 1991, a month before she was to visit Israel.

Kellman says she has had about 50 calls from people interested in the mission, including several from Canada.

The itinerary includes floating in the Dead Sea, spending Shabbat at the Western Wall, visiting a northern kibbutz, horseback riding in the Galilee and touring the Golan Heights. Participants will also take part in Israel's 50th anniversary festivities throughout the country.

Hotel accommodations will be wheelchair accessible and transportation will be via a lift-equipped, accessible bus.

Kellman said the group will also meet with disabled Israelis and exchange information.

For details, call Kellman at 212-410-3733.

Israel loans $500,000 to help victims of Maccabiah tragedy

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegrahic Agency

SYDNEY — Maccabi Australia has welcomed a loan of $500,000 that the Israeli government advanced to help the victims of the bridge collapse at the recent Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The loan, which had been requested by Maccabi Australia and several Australian Jewish groups, was designed only to provide temporary help, according to the office of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The beneficiaries of the loan are expected to return the monies once insurance companies pay out compensation claims, the Prime Minister's Office said.

Tom Goldman, president of Maccabi Australia, last week told more than 400 Maccabi team members and friends that the loan had been matched by the Maccabi World Union.

Goldman said he hoped that the families suffering pain and loss would not also suffer financially duress.

Two Australian athletes were immediately killed and dozens of other participants at the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games were injured when a pedestrian bridge collapsed at the Ramat Gan stadium on July 14, plunging scores of people into the Yarkon River below.

Two more Australians died weeks later as a result of complications that medical officials linked to contaminants in the river water.

An additional 10 Australian athletes were in serious condition, reportedly as a result of having ingested water from the Yarkon, sparking accusations among some Australian Jews that Israeli officials were taking too long to issue the results of their tests of river water samples.

Goldman has commissioned independent tests on samples he brought back from Israel.

IDF and PA hold first joint exercise

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli soldiers and Palestinian policemen held a first-ever joint exercise last week, simulating a car-bomb attack on the Netzarim road through the Gaza Strip.

Both sides treated a mix of Israelis and Palestinians and the IDF praised the success of what it called a "humanitarian drill."

Senior IDF commanders expressed disappointment that there is no such cooperation on the intelligence level to fight terror. But the Palestinian Police said the drill showed they were meeting a commitment to cooperate on security matters.

Taking place on the road to Netzarim, the site of previous clashes and bomb attacks, both sides rushed to treat "wounded" hurt by an explosion. Members of both forces played the role of the wounded.

"The drill succeeded on its humanitarian level, since both military medical forces and Palestinian medical forces worked together and treated Palestinian and Israeli wounded together," said Lt.-Col. Ofer, deputy IDF regional commander. During the exercise, Palestinian wounded were evacuated to Gaza and the Israeli injured were transported by helicopter and ambulances to Israel.

"This is regarded as a factual response to all claims that the Palestinian Authority doesn't illustrate the required level of security cooperation," Saeb Ajez, Palestinian National Security commander in Gaza, told Reuters.

Ten Palestinian and five Israeli ambulances took part in the disaster drill.

"The Israelis gave us 75 minutes to evacuate the victims and we've done the operation in half the time," said Maj. Mohammed Joudeh of the Palestinian Military Medical Services.

Finding time, space in a Jewish Monday of healing

By SHIRA SHELLEY DUKE

Two years ago, I submitted an article inspired by Tisha b'Av to a Jewish newspaper. I expressed frustration regarding our lack of Jewish healing space.

Guest Voices

The article was never published, but it resulted in a personal phone call from the editor. That call became a symbolic Shema Yisrael and a turning point for me. Decades of having felt unheard, unseen and/or impotent to contribute authentically to mainstream Jewish life somehow magically fell away that year in the course of my community involvement.

The next summer, I once again contacted the editor. This time, I had been through a recurrence of cancer after eight years of remission and I was looking for somewhere in the Jewish community where I could healthily spend the Three Weeks of Mourning preceding Tisha b'Av.

My surgery had been on Purim, I told him. I'd been blessed with a new name from Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz and I'd benefited greatly from miracles of prayer from every branch of Judaism.

My clearest revelation now was that I, like Ruth, needed some kindly "gleaning ground" with my people to restore my healthy status. While I felt grateful, I said, to have found welcoming retreat opportunities in Christian, Buddhist, Taoist and New Age-type settings, it seemed important that I now find some way to immerse myself in the everyday rhythms and healing powers of my own faith.

The editor listened and kindly referred me to an outreach contact at Lubavitch. I share the humor and frustration of my call here, because I believe it is relevant and instructive for all our denominations. It comes with my sincere gratitude to Lubavitch for all the doors of Shabbat healing its community holds open and the ways they have helped me.

"Hello," I said. "I'm recuperating from cancer and was looking for a place to spend the Weeks of Mourning in a healing Jewish context."

"You mean you're looking for a place for Shabbos?"

"Well, not exactly. I'm actually blessed to have many good places to go for Shabbos. I'm looking for a place I could go for the rest of a Jewish week."

"You mean you want to rent a room."

"Well, not exactly. I actually have a room…I'm looking for the Jewish spiritual people to go with a room – people I could pray with, study with and share the rhythms of a Jewish spiritual life with."

"My wife would like that, too, but she's got eight children."

"Maybe I could help her with the children and she could help me with the immersion?"

"Maybe – maybe, in Israel or in New York. But in Toronto, you can come for Shabbos. By Monday, everyone will be out working. You'll sit in an empty house."

I called the editor back for one more try. He referred me this time to a rabbi who told me. "You have to go back to Lubavitch. For what you need, you need a large community. No one family or small group can do it. Call them back and don't tell them anything about yourself this time. Just tell them that you want to come for Shabbat. They are not totally wrong. Shabbat redeems the week. It's where a Jew needs to start."

I did what the rabbi told me for the next few months. While I still can't say that I've found "Monday" in Judaism, his advice was good. I did in fact re-immerse myself in full days of Shabbat observance with people who were good for my healing.

From there, my rekindled faith in Shabbat's redemptive powers got renewed with the help of other committed rabbis and friends in every denomination of Jewish life. I also found the rabbi a most patient and generous teacher who consistently took time to hear my calls for help during a long, hard year of dealing with yet another recurrence of cancer.

This rabbi's simple examples of mitzvot, service, healing prayers and human dignity helped me to more meaningfully understand, receive and even contribute to the levels of bikur cholim (caring for the sick) that Reform, Conservative, secular and Orthodox Jews alike offer.

When I wanted a healing space this summer, where I could quietly be with others while I threw up and lost my hair during chemotherapy, I gratefully took all the Shabbat light, tzedakah and blessings Jews could offer me and ran (okay hobbled!) to a kindly Mennonite farm-household with lessons about doing front-line service and hospitality.

I spoke to Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl recently. He told me about developments of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project and recommended an up-coming conference on What Is Jewish Healing? being offered by the National Centre for Jewish Healing Sept. 8 and 9 in Toronto. The next morning, I found myself calling out a mournful lament to this good rabbi's answering machine on my way to chemotherapy.

"What I don't understand about our people," I mourned, "is why no one ever asks me about Jewish healing. It's like designing a cancer program without talking to cancer patients. I feel like a wasted resource…" I knew the rabbi was on his way to Israel and I wasn't actually blaming him personally so I didn't need a direct reply, I told him, but I needed to express my frustration.

A few days later, I received a call from Susie Kessler, director of training and education for the National Centre for Jewish Healing in New York. She said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl had told her about me and that I sounded like the perfect layperson for a space they had been holding open on their plenary panel. She invited me to speak — on the Monday.

Few people will ever understand the significance of this little "time/space" for me on a Jewish Monday of healing in Toronto.

No one can take anyone else's steps of return through the gates of each New Year for them. With HaShem's help, however, I think that people who make time to sincerely listen and authentically respond to the laments of others often work untold miracles.

Double the number of Canadians travelling to Israel

New IGTO head sets target

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With Israel's 50th anniversary only months away and the Christian bimillennium approaching in the year 2000, the new director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Toronto has set himself a challenge – to double the number of Canadians travelling to Israel by the end of his four-year term.

"Sure it's a lofty goal," Arie Shevy-Shibi admitted during a recent interview. "But I think it's possible, taking into consideration that we've seen growing numbers of Canadians come to Israel – from about 20,000 to 52,000– each year over the past decade."

For his ambition to be realized, Shevy-Shibi acknowledged that the Palestinian-Israeli peace process, which many have characterized as an unstoppable train, must not get stuck in its tracks.

"There's a tight connection between the peace process and tourism. They go hand in hand. We need peace for tourism to increase."

But he noted that various joint ventures between the tourism authorities of Israel, Jordan, Egypt and the Palestinian Authority are still on the rails, even if the peace process seems temporarily stalled.

Planning is still progressing on the proposed Common Peace International Airport to serve the twin Red Sea towns of Eilat and Aqaba, and the Israelis and Jordanians continue to work together to develop an underwater park for their coral-rich, shared harbor.

Another continuing project is the proposed Lowest Park in the World, a joint venture between the Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians in the Dead Sea region. Egypt, the Palestinians and Israel are also co-operating in a venture to develop tourist sites at various Mediterranean ports such as El Arish, Gaza and Ashdod.

Arie Shevy-Shibi

By investing big money in the region, the international business community is expressing confidence that a stable peace will be achieved, Shevy-Shibi said. He noted that Hilton, Sheraton, Radisson, Movenpick, Accor and Day's Inn are among the major hotel chains constructing new properties in Israel.

Though it seems ambitious, Shevy-Shibi's goal to double the number of Canadians to Israel is in keeping with the official projections of Israel's Tourism Ministry. The tourism sector presently accounts for about six percent of the Israeli economy and employs about 120,000 workers.

Economic forecasters say it could experience phenomenal growth in the next few years, if political conditions are right. Whereas Israel received close to 2.5 million visitors last year, planners indicate the figure could reach five million by the year 2000, especially if the Pope makes his long-promised pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

Besides wooing the Jewish market, Shevy-Shibi intends to court the Christian market through a series of seminars directed at the clergy.

"The Catholics and the Protestants are very faithful travellers," he said. "It's kind of an irony that in times of crisis, we see more Christians than Jews in Israel. I'd like to ask Jewish travellers who are planning to come to Israel, please not to cancel because of any ghastly sporadic events. I call upon all our Jewish brothers and sisters to stay with us in our hour of need."

Commemoration of Israel's 50th anniversary commences in October with a series of concerts. The anniversary officially begins with the lighting of the first Chanukah candles on Dec. 23. Tied to the anniversary, Israeli authorities are planning a new forest for the northern Negev desert and a large march from the Judean desert to Jerusalem in April.

In Canada, the IGTO is planning a run a new television commercial and to stage its annual seminars for travel agents in major cities. But perhaps the biggest promotional event of the coming year will be the meeting of some 1,000 members of the Association of Canadian Travel Agents (ACTA), scheduled for Tel Aviv next June. Within the travel industry, the ACTA convention is seen as a major coup for Israel.

"We have plenty of aircraft flying from Canada to Israel," Shevy-Shibi said. "Now I want to fill the seats on those aircraft and I'm going to work hard to do it. I believe in hard work and I believe in what Herzl said: 'If there's a will, there's a way.'

"If there's a will, it's not a fantasy any more," he said. "It's a reality."

Executive's artistic gene emerges

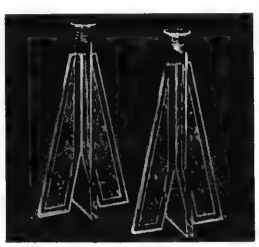
By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

THORNHILL — Iraqi born, Israeli raised artisan Judd Shemesh has chosen glass for his meticulously crafted Judaica because, he says, it is timeless.

Unlike clay and stone, which can deteriorate, glass retains its original character, "even after a thousand years." It is particularly appropriate for the distinctive menorot, candlesticks and mezuzot that comprise his Glassique collection.

Shemesh, who studied business administration in England, came to Canada in 1973 and for 17 years held an executive position with a recognized Canadian grocery conglomerate. Though business was his forte, he comes from a creative family. His mother and brother are skilled clothing designers and his sister is a sculptor and painter.

"I guess the artistic gene was in me," he muses and it has emerged full blown.



Glass candlesticks

Working out of his Thornhill studio, he conceives and executes contemporary pieces based on geometric circles and triangles.

Using commercial glass and crystal for strength, he sandblasts, carves, paints and polishes, uniting the components with no visible seams.

The result is a series of traditional artifacts in state of the art terms — clean cut with warmth and color.

Mezuzot, painstakingly polished, hand carved and painted in blue, carmine, gold, have a stained glass quality.

A remarkable menorah is so designed that a superimposed Magen David (Star of David) appears in triplicate. This was presented as a gift for the White House in Washington, D.C., when members of a Jewish organization visited there.

Shabbat candles are structured as a "seamlessly" joined pair or separated. The double version has wide appeal.

The Judd Shemesh Glassique collection is featured in the National Glass Museum in Waterloo. There are also two pieces on display in New York's Museum of Modern Art.

Glassique is available in fine shops across Canada, major United States cities and South America.

PRODUCER MAKES VARIETY'S '50 HOTTEST' LIST

Camelia Frieberg, producer of Atom Egoyan's acclaimed The Sweet Hereafter, has been selected for Variety magazine's annual profile of the 50 hottest "behind the scenes" creative talents in North America. The profile appeared in Variety's issue of Aug. 25.

The Sweet Hereafter, Frieberg's recent collaboration with Egoyan, is the opening-night presentation of the Toronto International Film Festival, which begins this week. She has also produced several other Egoyan films, and is currently producing The Fishing Trip, a feature film by first-time director Amnon Buchbinder. She's also involved in preproduction for Jeremy Podeswa's The Five Senses, which is slated for production next spring.

"I was really surprised and pleased that Variety chose to single me out," Frieberg said. "And I was equally pleased that they're focusing on the creative accomplishments of two Canadian women."

The only other Canadian on Variety's list is writer-director Lynne Stopkewich, who made the film Kissed.

* * *

Ofra in Concert: Tickets have already begun selling for globally acclaimed cellist Ofra Harnoy, who appears at a one-night gala concert at Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Ave., Nov. 26, 8 p.m. Tickets for reserved seating and a post-concert reception are $135 (a maximum allowable tax receipt to be provided). General admission is $55. Ticket hotline, 416-425-1963.

* * *

Sci-Fi Composer: Lexx – The Dark Zone Stories, a science-fiction movie that aired on City TV twice in August and airs again Sept. 4 and 11 at 9 p.m., has a distinctive musical score that complements the extraordinary visuals. It's the work of Montreal-born composer Marty Simon, who recently moved to Toronto.

The former globe-trotting rock musician, whose career includes session work with Mick Jagger and memorable musical jams with Jimmy Page and Jimi Hendrix, has received numerous awards for the dozens of film and television soundtracks that he has composed since 1987. The Lexx soundtrack was recently released on CD and is available in record stores across Canada.

* * *

David Broza Returns: Israel's best-selling recording artist, David Broza returns to Toronto's Music Hall Oct. 12 for a third Toronto performance in as many years. His unique combination of flamenco guitar, Mediterranean music, Latin rhythms and American blues has thrilled audiences worldwide.

Broza is active in the search for Middle East peace. He has campaigned for the mixed Arab-Jewish town Neve Shalom (Wahlat Al Salam) that his grandfather helped found in 1970. He has sung at memorial ceremonies for Yitzhak Rabin at Madison Square Gardens and in a CBC radio tribute.

Also on the bill is Toronto songwriter Marc Jordan, who has composed hits for Rod Stewart, Jeff Healey, Chicago, Joe Cocker and Amanda Marshall. His latest album is Cool Jam on the Sony Music Canada label.

Tickets are $19.95 to $36.85 from TicketMaster, 416-870-8000. Music Hall, 147 Danforth Ave.

New play based on A.M. Klein's poetry and prose

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A.M. Klein was a failure because his quest for a personal messiah in his poetry was unsuccessful.

This is the premise of a new play about the famous Canadian Jewish poet from Montreal by Arnold Bennett, an American now living in Newfoundland.

Titled The Failure, the play is based on Klein's poetry and prose but the central character, the Poet, is not identified as Klein. The poet is played by a woman and the only other character is The New Yorker, an admirer of Klein's work.

This is the 25th anniversary of Klein's yahrzeit. The poet went into seclusion at the height of his powers in 1954 and did not write a line for 18 years, dying in 1972.

Playwright Bennett, a Democratic party speech writer and an award winning documentary film maker, recently settled in Manuels, near St. John's.

His portrayal of Klein as a failure is challenged by Adam Fuerstenberg, of Toronto, an academic who has studied and written about the poet. "He was not a failure," said Feuerstenberg.

"I think the message of my play is that we must look for the meaning of A.M. Klein's life in our own lives," Bennett told The CJN in an interview.

Klein won the Governor General's Award for poetry for The Rocking Chair. He was at one time editor of the Canadian Jewish Chronicle and a speech writer for Samuel Bronfman, founder of the modern Canadian Jewish Congress.

"Klein had a deep conflict between his religious faith and his reason and this was at the heart of his ultimate collapse," Bennett said.

The play suggests that Klein was so angry at God for allowing the Holocaust that he attempted, in his poetry, to usher in a Messianic era. When he failed, the play says, he gave up and wrote no more.

Many of Klein's poems are used by the playwright to support his premise.

Four performances of The Failure were given in St. John's directed by Bennett, and produced by his wife, Nancy, a public relations consultant. One of the productions was sponsored by the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies and the Association of Canadian College Teachers of English.

Two musicians round out the four member cast. The specially composed music is by Jim Fidler.

Contrary to public belief, Bennett said that during the time he was a recluse, Klein did venture out of his house from time to time to a French-Canadian bookstore and often sat on his porch. He had limited conversations with his family.

Bennett said he is in the midst of negotiations to put on the play in Montreal and would be interested in a Toronto production.

He became interested in Klein's work while attending college in the United States.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

THREE SPANISH TOWNS

Merida, a city of 41,000 inhabitants in the Spanish province of Estramadura, boasts the most spectacular Roman ruins in Spain and an outstanding museum in which many impressive ancient treasures are housed.

One's introduction to the National Museum of Roman Art in Merida is the town itself. Founded as a settlement for veterans of the army's Cantabria campaign, Merida became the largest Roman settlement on the Iberian peninsula.

There was plenty of entertainment in this glorified retirement community. An amphitheatre, built for gladiatorial matches, held about 15,000 while an adjacent coliseum-like theatre held 6,000 for more civilized dramatic fare.

Much of the old town lies buried beneath the modern city, but visible relics include a monumental Temple of Diana, a triumphal arch and an enormous 64-arch bridge. Several Renaissance-era mansions have incorporated standing pillars into their design. Mosaic floors are so common that an outdoor antiquities garden features several that are unprotected from the elements; visitors must walk on them to cross the site. Major statues of temple gods and goddesses were unearthed as recently as last year.

The site of the National Museum of Roman Art is so archeologically rich that its basement is a crypt revealing the remains of homes, a necropolis, a road and an aqueduct. The museum is regarded as perhaps the finest achievement of Rafael Moneo, one of Europe's most notable architects.

One enters a grand hall framed by a receding row of colossal Roman arches fashioned in sand-colored brick and topped by skylights. But the best surprise is yet to come. As one walks through this magnificent sunlight-filled space, one attains unobstructed cross-sectional views, right and left, of every gallery and display area on three levels.

The walls are adorned with huge mosaic floors bearing exquisite decorations and scenes of mythic heroes, boar-hunts and charioteers. A noble bust, life-sized statue or decorative pillar fills every alcove.

Inscribed tablets tell of the circus, the exploits of the war dead, the glory of the emperors. Display cases show off Roman glass, coins, combs, dice, pottery, surgical instruments.

Moneo interweaves ancient and modern design features in such a way as to continually surprise and delight. Opened 11 years ago, the National Museum of Roman Art remains a shining paragon of museum design.

Segovia Synagogue: During their 600-year occupation of the land they called Hispania, the Romans built many roads and works. An extensive and remarkably well-preserved aqueduct stands in the central Spanish town of Segovia, north of Madrid.

Strolling from the aqueduct up the main street, one passes several fine churches and the medieval Convent of Corpus Cristi, which visitors may enter. Originally a synagogue, it was built in 1345 and operated until Jewish worship was banned in 1410. Architecturally grand, the interior features numerous horseshoe pillars in the moorish style, but the stone has lost all memory of the building's Jewish past.

The neighboring streets once formed the heart of the Jewish quarter, which once had five synagogues and eight gates. The Segovia Archaeological Museum stands on a site that locals still refer to as "the house of the Jewish butcher."

Picturesque Hervas: Driving through central Spain, particularly in mountainous sections, one sees many exposed stretches of Roman roads. In the provinces of Estramadura and Castilla y Leon, these roads were important sheep-herding routes in the Middle Ages. Consequently, the mountain-pass towns of Hervas and Bejar, near the Portuguese border, each developed a strong wool trade and notable Jewries.

All traces of a Jewish quarter have disappeared from Bejar but after much restoration, Hervas has one of the best-preserved "barrios Judios" in Spain. Most of its 400 cottages are made of wood beams and bricks joined by a mortar of mud and straw. The town has painstakingly restored the quarter in the reasonable hope that the antique setting will draw travellers keen on remembering Spain's Jewish past.

Published three months ago, the Lonely Planet guide to Spain makes an excellent companion for any traveller in Spain.

Aviva Aronovich

Classical pianist at Ford Centre

TORONTO — Pianist Aviva Aronovich will perform a sold-out concert at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on Sept.7 at 2:30 p.m. under the sponsorship of the Aviva Chapter of Hadassah-WIZO.

Aranovich is scheduled to perform selections from Haydn, Chopin, Ravel, Liszt, Bach-Busoni, Medtner, Scriabin and Rachmaninoff.

Aranovich was born in Lithuania and made aliyah in 1973. She graduated from the Rubin Academy at the Tel-Aviv University where she won the annual piano competition for two consecutive years.

In New York at the celebrated Juilliard School, she received a full scholarship to study with Peter Serkin and graduated in 1990 with a Master's Degree.

Among her accomplishments, Aranovitch won the Vercelli International Piano Competion in Italy, as well as prestigious contests in Spain and the United States.

Business Profile

Home fashion firm offers Israeli products

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The headquarters of Revelle Home Fashions Inc. couldn't be more inviting. Just beyond the reception area, past a narrow 10-drawer chest with plush towels spilling out of partially opened drawers, is a cozy showroom with seven beds, each draped with the newest Revelle linens and accented with stylishly coordinated home accessories.

At a small round table covered with a jacquard tablecloth imported from Israel, Revelle co-owners Freddy Faust, 43, and Barbara Grnak, 41, sat over freshly poured coffee and a plate of baked goods and explained their business philosophy.

"We're not big on titles and ceremony," began Grnak. Their individual business cards, in fact, carry no title, only their names and the company name. "When you're both there from the bottom, building it hammer and nails, it's hard to say, 'You're the president.' We're both equal partners. All of the major decisions are made by us together. As a matter of fact, we share an office."

Neither has formal business training. "I think a lot of it is common sense and hard work," said Faust.

The roomy office he shares with Grnak – in contrast to the showroom – favors function over style. To Grnak's chagrin, it holds an increasing amount of clutter, evidence of Revelle's upcoming move to larger premises in the same Adelaide Street West building.

The business that began as Down-Town Duvets & Linens Ltd. when their separate cottage industries joined forces 17 years ago has grown to a 50-employee, almost $5-million-a-year enterprise, weathering two recessions along the way. (Revelle is a division of Down-Town Duvets, which manufactures Revelle products as well as its own high-end line of duvets, pillows, window treatments and accessories.)

"The key is to not be in debt when the recession comes," said Grnak. "Then you can plan to grow later. We're extremely cautious."

Next week, Revelle will receive an honorable mention at the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce & Industry's second annual Business Excellence Awards ceremony, for initiatives the company has taken in introducing Israeli products to the Canadian market. They are exclusive distributors in Canada for four Israeli mills, and almost half their trade is now conducted with Israel. Over the past four years, they have quadrupled their Israeli imports.

Since the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (FTA) was implemented in January of this year, Revelle has expanded its selection of Israeli imports by about 10 percent and reduced prices on goods it was already importing.

Israeli tablecloths, for example, recently became part of Revelle's line. "The duty was pretty high," said Faust, explaining why they didn't import them before the FTA came into effect. Previously, duty on finished products like tablecloths was 22 percent. With the FTA, those tariffs have been eliminated.

Faust was born and raised in Tivon, near Haifa, and moved at age 15 with his family to what was then Rhodesia. There he acquired experience in his family's textile business before moving to Canada in 1977.

Grnak, a native of Toronto, has sewn "from the time I could walk" and has training in fine arts.

By 1978, she was working out of her apartment making duvets and pillows. Her company, Featherdown Quilts, still exists in the form of a retail store on upscale Cumberland Street, as part of Down-Town Duvets.

Shortly after immigrating, Faust and two partners were making duvet covers under the name Faust Agencies. Like Grnak, he was recently married and working from home.

Faust and Grnak met through a customer and found their businesses complemented each other. Within about a year, Faust suggested they start their own business.

Their success depends on honesty and fair play, said Grnak. "Otherwise it won't work."

"You've got to be compatible," said Faust, recalling that at the outset, they were told that the majority of business partnerships fail within the first five years.

Their first location, around the corner from their present one in Toronto's fashion manufacturing district, was 2,500 square feet, less than one-tenth the size of the 26,000-square-foot space into which they're moving.

Revelle owners Freddy Faust and Barbara Grnak display a colorful sheet made from Israeli fabric; coordinating reversible jacquards cover the bed. [Frances Kraft photo]

"Remember the days we'd get so busy that family members would come help us at night?" Grnak asked Faust.

Before long they began hiring cutters and sewers. Today there is an on-site factory crammed with textiles, cutting tables and machines. At one end, Israeli fabric is being sewn into sheets and duvet covers for export to Taiwan. Nearby, a woman is sewing sheet corners using a process created by Revelle for reversible designs. They were the first in Canada to use reversible jacquards (woven from Egyptian cotton and imported from Israel) for bedding.

Elsewhere duvet covers are getting buttonholes reinforced "so they don't fall apart in the wash," said Grnak. "When you pay a lot for duvet covers, you want to make sure they last."

In addition to manufacturing Revelle designs, the company continues to subcontract for companies like Springmaid and Wamsutta and to distribute foreign goods like Thistletex towels from Scotland. John Butterworth Flannels from England and Peacock Alley linens from the United States are also part of the Revelle line.

Of the dozen lines Revelle sells to department stores and high-end linen stores across Canada, the most luxurious is an Italian line called Pertile with hemstitched, scallop-edged, white-on-white sateen sheets. Recently Revelle has begun to use Israeli fabric to produce a similar product that sells for about half the price. (The Italian duvet cover retails for about $300.)

Revelle was created in the early 1990s so that Faust and Grnak could create and market their own designs, using fine imported fabrics. They choose designs and colors they think will appeal to Canadian consumers, working with suppliers from Italy, Portugal and the United States.

To be at the forefront of style, Revelle frequently adapts European designs to better suit the Canadian market. "We often recolor a design or mix and match two designs not intended to be together," said Grnak.

Featherdown, their only retail outlet, is "a good way for us to test new designs" to see how well they will sell, said Faust.

"As a retailer, you're expected to be ahead of the times," said Grnak, "but it's a bit of a risk."

"[Some of] what you see here will be in the stores in a month to three months from now," said Faust.

Among the items sold under their Ambiance label is an environmentally friendly natural cotton product available in a range of soft, earthy colors. The cotton, marketed under the name TopCot, comes from a kibbutz where it is grown in white, olive green and fawn, which are mixed to create variations in color.

Faust has Ambiance color-grown bedding at home and swears it "feels softer all the time," even after over 100 washings.

Faust and Grnak test new fabrics themselves to check for shrinkage. "We throw them in with every load," said Grnak. "We try to abuse them as much as we can to see what it takes to wreck them. We may advise the customer to handle with care."

Grnak was delighted to learn "how much Israel had to offer in the way of fine fabrics. We wanted something nobody else had."

Revelle's initial contact with Israeli mills was arranged with help from the Israel Economic Mission, the Toronto office of Israel's trade commissioner.

"In Israel, we find they're very much on the mark, very service oriented and very quick to respond," said Grnak.

Their business relationship with Israel, in Faust's eyes, has been "a nice adventure."

"The Garden" tells story of Israeli fight for independence

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Carol Matas, a well-known Canadian author, has written several books about Jewish teenagers during the Holocaust. You may have read Lisa, or Jesper, about Danish resistance to the Nazis, or Daniel's Story, about a young boy's experiences in the concentration camps.

Last year, Matas published After the War, a moving account of Ruth Mendenberg, a young girl trying to escape from post-war Europe to what was then called Palestine.

Matas' latest book, The Garden (Scholastic, 1997), continues Ruth's story, as she struggles to rebuild her life in Palestine shortly before the establishment of the State of Israel.

The only way Ruth can deal with her memories of the terrible years is to create a kibbutz garden. But she loses even that comfort when British soldiers destroy it in a search for illegal guns.

One of the interesting themes in the book is the tension that existed between the Haganah, the resistance group that pledged to use only necessary force to fight the British and the Arabs, and the Irgun, whose are described by Ruth's brother Simon, when he says, "If they shoot us, we shoot back. If they hang one of ours, we hang three of theirs. That's it. That's the way it'll be."

The resistance efforts intensify after the United Nations votes to partition Palestine and create a Jewish state. Ruth's Haganah group, as well as Simon's Irgun, fight not only against Arab terrorists, but against the pro-Arab British as well. Several of her friends are killed.

In the midst of all the trouble, we see Ruth's relationship with Zvi, who escaped from Europe with her, blossom from friendship into love.

Let's hope that Carol Matas continues the story of Ruth and her friends, and the early days of Israel, in a future book.

California dreamin' a tough grind for rider

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Steve Harris does his California dreamin', it isn't thoughts of suntanning and surfing that come to mind.

Instead, he ponders an intricate balancing act that combines studying for an engineering degree, running a horse stable and competing in show jumping events.

The way he has it figured, in the morning he'll attend classes at the University of California at San Diego and in the afternoon he'll head back to his farm home, clean and groom his horses and then ride them around the obstacle course in the back yard. In the evening, he'll prepare for the next day's classes at university.

It's a tough grind, but he's got the energy and ambition to do it. After all, he did it all last year and beginning in mid to late September, Harris, 22, will resume that daunting lifestyle.

A native of California who grew up in Montreal, Harris has caught the equestrian bug. He's had it since he was 12, living with his parents, Gordon and Phylis, in Qualicum Beach on Vancouver Island. One summer back then, he spotted a riding stable and was immediately drawn to it. He wanted to try horseback riding and his parents agreed to take him to the stable. It turned out the stable was for finely tuned show-jumpers, not trail horses, but after boarding one of the beasts, Harris was hooked.

Up and over. Rider and mount easily clear this training hurdle.

"That was it," he recalled. "It was my parents' biggest mistake."

Perhaps, but it can also be seen as Harris' first step in the world of competitive horse jumping. By age 17, he was so involved in the sport that he purchased, with his parents' help, two 5-year-old warmbloods, Lancaster and Giacomo.

"I got them with the idea of bringing them along as young horses and competing with them or selling them," he said.

Four summers ago, Harris and his steeds entered the Canadian jumping circuit in Quebec "to see what I could do. In that year, I placed in pretty much every grand prix. I finished fourth in one, fifth and sixth in others...It was all new to me." But it reinforced his desire to stay in the sport, he said.

His second year was even better. He won the grand prix at Palgrave, finished fourth in Bromont and fifth in Quebec City. He was also getting more consistent in his performances.

Harris' jump up the equestrian ladder got him noticed by the powers that be in the Canadian horse-jumping community. He was approached by the Canadian Equestrian Team and invited to join, which he gladly did. His first international event was the Washington International Horse Show, where he rode as part of Canada's Nations Cup team.

With international competition under his belt, Harris was ready for the Olympic trials, or so he thought. Unfortunately, on day one of the trials, when the obstacles are the easiest, Lancaster clipped a few rails. Even though they bounced back later in the competition, "that was it. I was very upset that I made mistakes, but because the sport was much bigger, better and more developed in Europe, I decided to take Lancaster and go there."

By then, Harris had made contacts in the equestrian world and he received a job offer from John Whittaker, an Englishman who ranks as one of the premier riders in the world. For six months, Harris worked for Whittaker, training horses and competing in equestrian events. Even though the European competitions are more difficult than those in North America, with bigger and broader hurdles, he and Lancaster finished second in the Wales Derby. They went on to a sixth place finish in a class in Linz, Austria as well as 10th in the grand prix (where the hurdles are most difficult), out of 150 European entries.

From England, Harris moved to Belgium where he again trained others' horses. Riding Atilas d'Autan, he finished second in one grand prix and followed that up with fifth and sixth place finishes.

"I brought along a lot of young horses that the breeder sold and I learned an incredible amount. So did Lancaster."

But by then he was riding others' horses more often than his own and he felt it was time to return to Canada.

This past summer, living and working at a farm near Terra Cotta, 90 kilometres northwest of Toronto, Harris participated in several show jumping competitions. The season was something of a disappointment as both Lancaster and Giacomo were recovering from minor injuries that hampered their effectiveness, but which should pose no long-term health effects.

The week before at Collingwood, Lancaster was clean in the grand prix, but because Lancaster has been lame much of the summer, Harris didn't enter him in other "trials."

Earlier, his other horse, Giacomo, was second in his open class at the Palgrave show in Quebec.

The horses' showing this summer disappointed Harris, who knows they can do much better. He believes that with continual improvement, he and Lancaster will rejoin the Canadian team and compete in the Olympics.

In the meantime, he's got to make do with modest pay days, which makes life tough for someone with limited means.

"This is a rich man's sport and I'm no rich man," he says.

Harris is constantly on the lookout for corporate or individual sponsors or for horse-owners looking for someone to train their mounts. He's had lots of experience improving the value of jumpers, he points out.

To contact Harris in California (after Sept. 22), call 619-759-1613. Prior to that, he can be reached in Ontario at either 519-833-7095 or 519-833-2230.

The Inside Back

Herzl: Man of vision and dreams

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Zionism at 100

NEW YORK — Even the most casual student of Zionism learns the story of how Theodor Herzl was willing to accept Uganda as the future homeland of the Jewish people.

As is often the case, however, the reality behind this fact about the founder of modern political Zionism is somewhat more complicated than it would appear.

Herzl first became interested in the Jewish question while studying law in the early 1880s. But it wasn't until 1895, when as a journalist from Vienna he witnessed the anti-Semitism surrounding the trial of French Capt. Alfred Dreyfus, that he became convinced of the need for a Jewish homeland.

The following year, he published his famous manifesto Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State). In it, Herzl wrote that the Jews' future homeland could be anywhere the Jewish people wanted it to be – but he preferred it to be in the historic land of Israel.

Herzl's ideas did not come out of a vacuum. They emerged from the zeitgeist of nationalism that had swept across Europe in the 19th century.

But if Herzl was a practical man, he was also a visionary. In a later novel titled Altneuland (Old-New Land), he wrote about a Palestine in which men and women, Arab and Jew, have equal rights.

He concluded the novel with what became a famous Zionist slogan: "If you will it, it is no dream."

In 1897, he convened the First Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland, the first international gathering of nationalist Jews. The congress adopted what came to be known as the Basel Program, which stated, in part, that Zionism seeks to establish a home for the Jewish people in Palestine secured under public law."

In the following years, as president of the World Zionist Organization, Herzl devoted himself to earning international recognition of Jewish national legitimacy.

When Herzl presented the "Uganda scheme" to the Sixth Zionist Congress in August 1903, therefore, it seemed he did so mainly as a tactical manoeuvre.

He had already realized that support from Britain, then the world's greatest power, was a necessary prerequisite for the Jews to achieve a homeland. Indeed, this was why the Jewish National Fund was incorporated as a British company and why the Fourth Zionist Congress was convened in London.

In June 1902, Herzl travelled to London where he declared that while the Zionist movement was committed to settling in Eretz Yisrael, it would consider plans to alleviate the plight of Jews by any method possible. He later explained that he was specifically referring to Cyprus and the Sinai Peninsula.

Later that year, British Colonial Secretary Joseph Chamberlain rejected the idea of Cyprus, but was intrigued by the Sinai proposal. A commission was formed to study the idea, but when the Egyptian government withdrew its support, so too did Britain.

In April 1903 Chamberlain first raised the possibility of Jewish settlement in British East Africa in an area that is today part of Kenya. Herzl rejected it.

Only after Chamberlain reiterated the idea to the journalist L. J. Greenberg did Herzl begin to see its value. He not only wanted to maintain warm relations between the Zionist movement and Britain, he also apparently believed that the granting of an autonomous Jewish settlement in East Africa might serve as the first step toward the political recognition of the Jewish nation.

It is not clear if Herzl's move won him any diplomatic points.

It certainly didn't among the Zionist delegates from Russia at the Sixth Zionist Congress, some of whom walked out when the Uganda plan was discussed. Herzl attempted to win them back by declaring at the congress' final session the words of the famous Psalm 137, "If I forget thee O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning."

He managed to convince the Zionist Greater Council in Vienna in 1904 of the sincerity of his intentions to establish a Jewish state in Eretz Yisrael.

The story provides a window through which to see the founder of modern political Zionism: pragmatic, unafraid of controversy and above all, dedicated to giving his life for the creation of a homeland for the Jewish people.

1 cup brown sugar

In large pot of salted boiling water, cook noodles about 10 minutes. Drain in a colander.

In a large mixing bowl, combine all ingredients except brown sugar. Fold well.

Bake in a 375°F oven for 25 minutes. Sprinkle the brown sugar generously to cover the top. Bake another 10 minutes. Serves: 10.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I haven't held a job since my first child was born 11 years ago. I can type, file, answer phones and use a computer. I used to be a secretary but I've heard there aren't jobs for secretaries anymore. Maybe that's why I'm not getting any job offers. Maybe my resume is all wrong.

Dear Reader,

Today many businesspeople have learned to work without secretarial or administrative assistance yet these types of jobs are still the most widely available jobs in the market. Women and men who perform this type of work have modernized themselves to become office service coordinators or business assistants.

When you prepare your resume, says Rachel Lefkowitz in Wow! Resumes for Administrative Careers (McGraw-Hill 1997), "you're free to create new titles for yourself if your jobs justifiably deserve them." But be careful she cautions. "Make sure it's a reasonable title that your previous employer would agree with. The last thing you want is for a prospective employer to get contradicting information when following up on employer references."

The other suggestion she makes is to focus your resume on your skills and strengths by using a functional style resume.

Wow! Resumes for Administrative Careers can provide an easy method for developing the resume that will get the attention you want.

Finally, while it is still acceptable to mail your resume and cover letter in a white, 9x12 inch envelope, don't be afraid of sending it by fax.

'Mo-om this doesn't fit me anymore'

Shop for kids the easy way

By SHERYL HALPERN
Special to The CJN

Summer must be just about over. The back to school clothing sales are everywhere. Time to put down the iced tea and the mystery novel and think about school outfits.

I find that if I do my homework, the process of organizing school wardrobes can be almost painless (no last-minute shopping marathons, some last-minute name-taping).

How to begin? Empty the closets of all last year's school clothes (whether mix and match coordinates or standard-issue uniforms) and get everyone to try everything on – gym pants, tunics, dresses, turtlenecks. Make it a (slightly weird) fashion show. Find out what's been outgrown since June (lots). Make lists of what you need.

Keep it simple. Plan ahead for those grim mornings when nobody seems to get dressed on time by making sure that everything that gets pulled out of the closet matches. Buy in batches (three identical pairs of trousers or joggers, two identical jumpers or skirts, six identical pairs of socks) in colors that coordinate.

The kids will find this "boring." Boring is good. (Buy that one must-have pair of painter pants or that special sweater, and you'll live to regret it. It will (a) get torn (b) be in the wash or (c) be impossible to find when its owner wants it at 7:30 in the morning.)

If you find real bargains, buy them in the right size and one size larger, so that you're prepared for the mid-year growth spurt ("Mo-om! This doesn't fit me any more!"). This goes for "school shoes," too – which seem to go on sale only at back to school time. (Buy dark-toned shoes. Kids always scuff their way home.)

Don't worry about versatility. It would be nice if school clothes could double as play and party clothes – but that could only happen in a world where all students were extremely neat and schools did not feature hot pizza days and didn't teach writing (ink and marker stains) or art (poster paint stains – my favorite).

My daughter's closet has three strictly segregated wardrobes: school, play and "good wear." I'd hang the clothes on different-colored hangers (the experts say this helps) but I'm not that organized.

One word: Laundry. How many trips to the washing machine do you want to make? When I can, I try to get enough T-shirts, turtlenecks and socks or tights to last a full school week — and get good quality pants, tunics and sweaters in dark, hide-the-dirt shades.

Gym clothes are a special case, since they always need to go straight into the wash (sometimes they jog there on their own). I've learned to buy as many gym outfits as there are gym days.

Three words: Lost and found. Try to keep all that new school clothing out of that bin at the end of the hallway by labeling everything that could get tossed into a locker or onto a bench, from hats and sweaters to shoes. (Remember, though, that you're basically doing damage control. Somehow, a few meticulously labeled items will get lost.)

You can do it the easy way – mark names on the clothing care tags with an indelible pen (but be aware that tags tear off easily.) You can do it the hard way – with sew-on or iron-on (my choice) nametapes. Try not to do it at the last moment. (Somehow I always end up nametaping madly at 1 a.m. But I wouldn't recommend it.)

Finish this particular school assignment, and you can settle down – by, say, late September – to fairly easy to manage mornings. (Now, if I could work on my husband's "casual Friday" outfits...)

Isa Designs provide stylish snoods

Isa Designs' new line of headwear in 40 styles and a variety of colors, with patented extensions in 21 shades, are designed to add confidence and dignity by enhancing the appearance of women who wear them.

Isa Lefkowitz credits her exposure to Orthodox Judaism for the original idea for her business.

Lefkowitz became religious while travelling in Israel eight years ago. She immediately noticed that the traditional snoods worn by married Orthodox women lacked style.

She desinged an elegant, appliqued, black velvet snood and presented it to her rabbi's wife whose friends clamored for more. Probably never before has the snood received such imaginative treatment. Lefkowitz's business was off and running.

It didn't immediately occur to her that the needs of Orthodox Jewish wives were nearly identical to those of women experiencing hair loss. That notion came to her while she was volunteering at a hospital, working with cancer patients. Lefkowitz brought in some of her designs and saw how they brightened the looks and attitudes of those women who wore them.

"Many women feel that the loss of hair from chemotherapy or from alopecia areata (an illness that causes permanent hair loss) and other diseases is worse than the disease itself," says Lefkowitz, who won an international design competition that vaulted her to positions at Guess Jeans and Beverly Hills Polo Club. "My clients tell me they've never felt so good as when they're wearing my designs and that positive attitude really helps their healing process."

"Isa is so in tune with what these women are going through and her hats make them feel wonderful," says Renee Blatt who works with women who are undergoing chemotherapy at Torrence (CA) Memorial Medical Centre in San Diego, where Isa Designs is based.

Starting in her parents' home, Isa Designs now has a factory in downtown San Diego where she produces and ships hundreds of hats each week. She can hardly keep up with the demand as her own catalog customers join those referred by support groups, hospitals, wig boutiques, hair replacment establishments and cancerr survivor's catalogues.

Lefkowitz's new catalogue is available in slightly different versions for each of her markets.

"From the outside, I am marketing to totally different groups," she says. "But really, their needs are the same. Whether Orthodox wives or women with hair loss, these women want to cover their heads in a way that looks totally natural and makes them feel wonderful about the way they look."

To order a catalogue write to Isa Designs, 956 10th Ave., San Diego, Calif. 92101.

The fountain of youth?

By CAROL BIRKEN-WISE
Special to The CJN

Cellex-C, is likely the most exciting, non-prescription skin care product available today and could possibly be the answer to our universal obsession with aging.

The true science behind Cellex-C is that, unlike other vitamin C skin care products, only Cellex-C incorporates L-Ascorbic acid (vitamin C), zinc sulphate, and L-tyrosine that work synergistically to provide astounding results. Simply, a unique cocktail that claims to retard the aging process.

Thanks to breakthrough vitamin C research and a formula developed by Loraine Faxon Meisner, chief of preventive medicine at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, a stabilized form of L-ascorbic acid that can be absorbed into skin has been developed.

L-ascorbic acid is the only form of vitamin C the body can recognize and utilize to stimulate collagen synthesis. It is essential for the growth and maintenance of connective tissue, thus, vitamin C promotes the appearance of smoother, firmer more youthful looking skin.

Cellex-C was created through a desire to formulate a product that worked proactively rather than re-actively. Alpha hydroxy acids and vitamin A derivatives are reactive. They produce skin-smoothing effects by causing a slight irritation which results in skin peeling. This, in turn, causes skin cells to divide more rapidly to make up for loss of cells from the protective outer layer.

Cellex-C achieves its results by helping to reinforce the outer layer of the skin's natural defence against oxy radical attack (a chemical reaction to environmental conditions such as sunlight, smoking and pollution that cause skin aging). Cellex-C actually neutralizes the oxy radical before the damage begins.

The company promotes its results with untouched before and after photos. Expression lines are minimized, as well as discoloration and crows feet around the eye area. It takes approximately six to eight months of using Cellex-C daily to achieve full results.

Although many cosmetic products contain vitamin C derivatives, they do not produce the same visible skin-enhancing effects as Cellex-C. The reason — not only must vitamin C be in the form of L-ascorbic acid, it must also be in a specific concentration to allow absorption by the skin. Cellex-C is sold through dermatologists, plastic surgeons and licensed skin care professionals. The product is also available at The Anti Aging Shop in Toronto.

Mirabelli seduces

For Fall '97, Franco Mirabelli seduces. With body-hugging knits and stretchy fabrics, the Franco Mirabelli collection has taken on a new edge.

The line between the signature collection and the M line has blurred. The new power suit is the basis of the collection, but the attitude is sexy, with stretchy pieces mixed into every fabric group.

The latest high-tech fabrics add a twist to Mirabelli's long lean suiting. Lycra fabrics are the truning point, with rib knits and stretch pieces adding flexibility ot day dressing.

The newest silhouettes: maxi coats, form-fitting dresses, belted knit jackets, flare leg pants, ankle-length skirts and super-short mini skirts.

Give clothes new lease on life

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

Re-dressings can give clothing that no longer fits or is out of date a new lease on life.

A clothing design company run by designer Krysta Siuda, Re-dressings transforms old clothing into new wearable items.

Many people have special items in their closet that they can't wear because they've changed sizes or the clothing in no longer fashionable, Siuda said. "We rework existing clothing into new styles and designs."

She has converted jackets into vests, and created dresses out of two skirts, she said. "There are unlimited possibilities. A person can bring any fabric item [from] their own wardrobe. Anything is workable."

She said her design service appeals to people who want high quality, well-fitting, individualized items of clothing. "The focus for me is on quality and creativity rather than uniformity and high volume production."

Re-dressing is a home service and Siuda offers wardrobe consultations, clothing redesign and design, as well as alteration and repairs, all in her clients' homes.

She can incorporate other fabrics into the reworked clothing as well, she said, noting that she prefers using natural fibers such as linen, cotton, silk and hemp.

Siuda who has been sewing for 30 years, has studied tailoring, drafting, patterning and draping at George Brown College and Ryerson Polytechnic University. Initially she worked in theatre, designing costumes, because she was interested in creating "one-of-a-kind unique pieces," she said.

At one community theatre the costume budget was so low she had to create new costumes out of old ones, she said. "We could make our limited budget go very far."

This experience led her to offer a similar service to private clients, she explained. "The theatre awakened me to the potential of the kind of work that could be done with reworking existing clothing into new designs."

Many people don't enjoy shopping and her service offers them an alternative which saves them both time and money, and provides them with a better fitting garment than something off the rack, Siuda said.

"In most cases a re-dressing costs significantly less than buying a new item of comparable quality... It will end up being made for you and your contours."

Hairstylist livens up out-of-style hairpieces

By REVA KAISER
Student Intern

Among the fashionable boutiques and trendy cafes lining the busy streets of Yorkville, one storefront salon is becoming increasingly popular with Orthodox women.

Frank and Claudio Pascuzzo, the owners of Fratelli (Italian for brothers), have been operating their hair salon on Cumberland Street for seven years, giving high-end haircuts to clients who appreciate their skill and experience, and can afford the pricier cut.

But in recent years, Frank Pascuzzo has seen an increase in his Orthodox clientele, who come to his salon to have their wigs styled and cut.

"If you take a wig that may not be a high-end wig and give it a high-end haircut," says Pascuzzo, "you'd be surprised with what you can get out of it."

About 15 percent of this year's clientele are women who wear wigs. Pascuzzo attributes the recent increase of these patrons to both word of mouth, as well as an awareness in the Orthodox community that there are different things one can do with a wig; many new, fashionable styles can liven up any hairpiece.

Five years ago, Madelaine Greenberg was the first Orthodox woman to bring her wig to Pascuzzo, after being impressed and satisfied with the haircuts he gave her children.

Madelaine Greenberg was the first to bring her wig to Pascuzzo.

"The idea of going to a stylist," she says, "is that he's more creative, more in tune with trying to achieve your look." Greenberg praises not only his creative talent and expertise, but also his sensitivity to Orthodox Judaism.

"Frank has an honest-to-goodness love for his craft and enjoys making you look great. You know you're getting 150 percent from him — in effort, energy and interest."

Pascuzzo does not find much difference between hair still attached to the scalp and hair made into a wig, except the need to consider the added bulk of hair tied up under the wig.

Whether he's cutting hair or a wig, Pascuzzo first sits the client in the consultation chair and works with the client to figure out what style will look best. He takes into consideration such features as profile and height in designing a style, because they all contribute to the final look.

After the consultation, Pascuzzo spray-wets the hair (most clients bring in their wigs clean, but if necessary, they can be cleaned on the premises) and generally cuts and styles it while on the client, realizing, of course, that many of these clients need a style that they can wear many different ways.

The whole strength is coming up with the style, Pascuzzo says. "We sit together and work together — a true professional works that way."

Trained in a Toronto hairdressing school, he worked part time while in school, and then returned to the salon after-hours to work for free because he enjoyed it so much. Then, a year-and-a-half after graduation, he opened up his first salon. That was 22 years ago.

Pascuzzo's specialty had always been fine, problem hair, and because of that, he had a lot of cancer patients coming to him. That led to the occasional wig which some cancer patients wear because of severe hair loss.

Working with a wig and making the client happy is a challenge. Many of his colleagues do not work with wigs, since they find the patrons fussy, Pascuzzo says, but he loves it. "That makes me a better hairdresser." Fussy clients don't really scare him. "I'm sure of what I'm doing — even if I do a major cut and I'm terrified, I don't let it show."

After the cut, Claudio Pascuzzo does the coloring, if the client wants. He's had 19 years experience in coloring, and is an expert in matching skin tones and eye color, which is very important in getting the color to look natural. As opposed to sitting in a salon for hours, a wig makes life a little easier, because the wig can be left in the salon for the treatment and then picked up a few days later.

Frank Pascuzzo is proud of the wide range of his clientele — he can have three generations in the same family as clients at one time — because it demonstrates his flexibility and ability to work with anyone and any kind of hair.

Pluck.

The Hockey Sweater:

My kids choose to wear uniforms

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

My sons will need some new clothes for school – every pair of pants they own is missing the knees. And I'd love to outfit them with a smart new wardrobe.

But you won't find me browsing in Gap Kids or any other children's clothing stores. There's no point checking out the latest back-to-school fashions.

My kids wear uniforms.

Not the private school variety with the grey flannel pants and the jackets with the school crests. We're talking about a self-imposed dress code. My 10- and 7-year-old sons have their own self-styled uniforms. They basically wear the same thing every day.

How ironic. Growing up in Montreal I had to wear a school uniform and I hated it. Public or private school, just about every girl in the city donned the same dreadful navy tunic – box pleated or V-neck with a sash. I wore pretty well the same outfit day in and day out for 12 long years ad nauseam.

But monotony is what my sons want. Almost everything they wear is black or navy blue and, most important of all, every item of clothing – T-shirts, shorts and sweats – has the emblem of the Toronto Blue Jays, Maple Leafs or Raptors. No logo no go.

Needless to say, I do a lot of one-stop shopping for them and I buy in bulk. Not that my kids would mind wearing the same pants or shirt for a week or two. Clean shmean. It's cool that counts for them.

And in the hierarchy of cool in my home, the Raptors rank higher than the Blue Jays. But the Toronto Maple Leafs rule. Which is a killer for this former Montrealer. I never switched allegiance from the Montreal Canadians.

Supporting the Leafs, historically the Habs' arch rivals, completely rubs against the grain of my upbringing. Of all the NHL teams, the Leafs were the most hated when I was growing up.

I confess that when my kids started lobbying for the licensed sports clothing a couple of years ago, I stocked up on Raptors and Blue Jays stuff, but I went easy on the Leaf items. Very easy. And that turned out to be disastrous last year.

Despite his lineage, my oldest son Leigh has become an ardent Leafs fan. He quietly began hoarding whatever Leaf clothing was available, though there wasn't much. This did not go unnoticed by my middle son Evan. He looks up to his older brother, the authority on cool in our house, and copies him at every opportunity.

Naturally Evan wanted to wear the Leaf stuff too. The boys started fighting over these clothes because they were in such short supply. Every morning I would find myself breaking up a tug of war – or worse – over a pair of sweat pants or a T-shirt.

I knew there was no way I was going through that nonsense again this school season and there was only one solution. When I went out to replenish the supply of sweat pants last week, I stuck to one color and one logo.

No self-respecting Montrealer should ever do this, but I swallowed my pride and in the name of family harmony, I bought 15 pairs of sweat pants with the Maple Leafs' logo and 10 matching T-shirts, enough for every day of the week in case I get behind with the laundry.

Of course with the kids wearing the same thing every day, the teachers will probably think I never do laundry. They'll probably do regular lice checks on the kids.

I also bought some pants for my youngest son Matthew, 5. With two older brothers, he mainly wears hand-me-downs, but lately he's been clamoring for Maple Leaf stuff too.

This might sound a little bit devious and calculating, but I'm really hoping my kids will grow so sick and tired of their Maple leaf "uniforms" – familiarity breeds contempt so to speak – that one day they'll beg to wear something different.

When the back-to-school shopping season rolls around next year, you may just find me in the children's clothing shops checking out the latest children's fashions.

But I'm not holding my breath. In all likelihood I'll be back at the same checkout with my pile of Maple Leafs logo clothing, mumbling to myself, "Next year at the Gap."

Tommy Hilfiger

The hottest name for kids

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Oh Tommy can you hear me? Tommy can you see me? Who is Tommy any way?

I think we all know him by now. His first name is Tommy, not Thomas, and he has a pretty funky, foreign-sounding surname — Hilfiger. He doesn't vary much in his color scheme — mainly navy blue, white, red and a medium grey. Tommy is a sportsman with a line of Tommy Sport, and a patriot, often incorporating the Canadian and American flags in his work.

Tommy Hilfiger has emerged as the season's hottest name brand. Long gone is the discrete Pierre Cardin or Leo Chevalier logo of my day — the biggest logo was a two-inch by two-inch leather belt loop softly proclaiming Howick jeans. Enter the six-inch high letters spread across Tommy Hilfiger items.

I wonder what the fascination of wearing someone else's name is all about. Teenagers and 30-somethings alike seem to have caught the bug. From T-shirts to sweatshirts to gym bags and footwear, Tommy stalks us everywhere. While retail price points are high, according to my teenage son, the quality and styling is there. He is quick to point out that there is a complete denim collection including jeans and chambray shirts with small logos on breast and back pockets.

Tommy's own scent

Tommy has his own scent as well. It is packaged in a signature square bottle with a silver cap, and wrapped, of course, in the mandatory red, blue and white box. The scent is light and slightly fruity. It is a men's cologne or after shave, which was a point of interest to me when my son (who does not as yet shave) wanted to take his hard earned babysitting money and buy himself a bottle to go with his Tommy T-shirt. (That's as far as I've been willing to contribute — he has now started saving for Tommy jeans).

He slapped some cologne on his neck, consulted with the chatty salesperson and carefully counted out close to $50. Not much change was returned.

His life was complete as she slipped his purchase into a mini Tommy shopping bag. Several applications later, I must say I enjoy the fragrance which permeates the house long after he has left for school.

Lea's Skin Care Clinic:

Taking care of your skin

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

The owner of Lea's Skin Care Clinic goes to great lengths to make her clients feel comfortable at the salon. "I want them to feel at home," she says.

Lea Stern — she prefers to be called Lea — recently relocated her clinic from Centrepoint mall to more spacious quarters at 390 Steeles Ave. W.

The carpeted waiting room, with its wall-to-wall pictures and television, looks like a living room. And that's by design Lea says. "I treat my clients like friends not numbers."

The salon is open every day to accommodate clients who come from as far as Buffalo.

With two assistants on hand, Lea's Skin Care Clinic offers full cosmetic care which includes body waxing, electrolysis, facials, manicures and pedicures.

She prides herself on the cleanliness of the salon. "I am a fanatic about hygiene. I even take the towels home every night and wash them myself because I don't trust a laundry service."

Lea, who has been practising cosmetology in the Toronto area for 25 years, says she is always taking workshops to upgrade her skills and to learn the newest techniques.

Keep those wrinkles away as long as you can

Lea Stern

"In this business there are lots of changes. I owe it to clients to get the best training possible."

She studied cosmetic chemistry in Italy, where she learned to formulate natural moisturizers and other creams made of fruits, herbs and oils.

Lea advises people to have a facial, which she calls deep cleaning, with every change of season. Four times a year, she says, is the minimal number, and she recommends that those who can afford it should have facials more often.

She also uses glycolic acid for skin peelings, which are carried out over five to six sessions. This treatment removes dead cells, leaving "beautiful clear new skin."

Lea says people should refrain from using soap which dries out the natural oils of the skin. Moisturizers need not be expensive, she says, noting that despite the hype there are no miracle creams.

She stresses that the most important way of preserving the skin is deep cleaning because the skin gets clogged from the dirt in the air, and without proper cleaning it accelerates the wrinkling of the skin.

Proper skin hygiene can postpone the onset of wrinkles Lea says.

"We're all going to get old. We're all going to get wrinkles. But we don't have to get them sooner than we should."

Fall Fashion

Beauty SHOP

By Carol Birken-Wise

Get into the swing of fall with bold new colors. Make a statement – there is nothing wishy washy about this season. Eyes will be sultry and yes, very sexy. Full provocative lips shimmer and shine, while nails are covered by anything with a metallic edge and invite you to be daring and try a little sparkle.

Follow some serious deep cleansing regimes, because your pores are likely clogged from the humidity of the summer months. You might also want to choose a more richly formulated moisturizer if your skin is beginning to feel dry. Continue to wear sun block as the UV rays are still damaging.

Keep up your diet and exercise routines, even though you are not wearing revealing clothing – you want to stay healthy and keep your skin looking vibrant. Drink at least eight glasses of water a day, it really makes a difference.

Carol's Tips

Skin Care — Prevent your skin from feeling dry and tight by starting your fall cleansing regime early. Lack of humidity in the air will cause dryness. Replace the lack of moisture with silky, skin-nutritious creams. Exfoliate to help remove the dead cells on the surface of your skin. Do this once a week and if your budget allows, treat yourself to a professional facial.

Chanel's vitamin rich Hydra Serum will revitalize your skin and provide instant, long-lasting hydration. Its oil free, non-greasy formula is designed to combat dehydration caused by harsh weather, sun, stress or air travel. Ultima II launches Vital Radiance, a unique skin perfecting treatment. This nourishing moisturizer helps improve the condition of your skin. It softens lines and will restore your skin to a radiant healthy glow. Available in October at all Ultima II counters. Biotherm introduces Biosource, an instant cleansing foam that works for all skin types and quickly eliminates all impurities in one quick step.

Foundation — The foundation you choose should make your skin look flawless and the color should blend with your natural skin tone. Apply it sparingly and blend well. Christian Dior's new Smoothing Creme-to-Powder Compact Foundation is great for touch ups and full coverage – it's your choice. Its texture is rich as creme, yet velvety as powder. It is easy to apply and travels well. It even absorbs excess oil to help prevent shine. For those long days, try L'Oreal's new Color Endure; it gives great coverage and is touch up free.

Lancome's Eau De Teint water based formula provides an ultra-natural youthful look. Fresh, light weight coverage, all in one little bottle. The new computerized Elizabeth Arden Custom Color technology will not only identify and match your perfect color right before your eyes, but will also save shade information for future purchases. This amazing service will be available mid-August at The Bay, Fairview, with staggered openings at five other Bay locations this Fall.

Cheek Color — From Elizabeth Arden comes a cool new compact in 10 gorgeous shades. Non-streaking, fade-proof colors blend beautifully to give your face a healthy glow. Don't miss great new shades from Lancome's Blush Subtil (oil-free powder) and Pommette (silky creme). Dust or blend high on your cheekbone and remember the golden rule – less is more.

Eyes — This season, eyes have a certain mystery. Create your own sultry look with exquisite new shades of the season. Lancome brings us Creme Powder Eye Color Duo in four spectacular shades and Le Stylo Waterproof – an eyeliner that really stays on! Chanel intrigues us with its fabulous Basic Eye Color compact. Create a smoky mauve eye brightened with silvery metallic accents. For thick movie star lashes, try Chanel's Double Lash Mascara — two dramatic cake mascaras of black and white. The white acts as a primer that plumbs and thickens lashes and the black provides definition and curl. The result is simply amazing!

Lips — Lips will return to classic shades ranging from soft and feminine to bold and bright. Chanel's "nude" liner will add definition to any color choice and top up all shades with their Black and White lip gloss compact, black to add intensity and white to soften – great fun. Crayon Grande is a fabulous new lipstick from L'Oreal. Beautiful colors and perfect for a quick touch up.

Hair — Hair shines with rich shades of brown while bangs are the main ingredient for your exciting fall face, says stylish designer, Daniel at Salon Daniel (25 Bellair). Hair Mascara by Dior, presents three new shades, fresh green, garnet red and ebony – what a smile maker. L'Oreal introduces Studio Line Senses to enhance the feel, look and scent of your tresses.The Feel – better texture, The Look – liquid shine and hold, The Scent – hair freshness.

Nails — Your nails will look their best well manicured with tips slightly squared. Choose from a variety of strong thrilling colors from Lancome, grey, steel, and khaki dipped in mother-of-pearl, just to name a few. Be wild and whimsical, make your nails your best fashion accessory. Revlon introduces a progressive line of nail care products called Nail Builders. No matter what condition your nails are in, splitting, breaking, peeling, this collection can restore them to a strong healthy state.

Fragrance — Fragrance will always enhance. Choose a light fresh scent to romance your favorite sweetie. This season, there are two particularly delicious scents for your special guy. Christian Dior introduces Dune for men. This green, oceanic and woody fragrance takes its cue from sap of trees — yes, back to nature. It's available in aftershave lotion and aftershave balm. Chanel's Pour Monsieur is discreetly elegant with its fresh and spirited citrus composition. It is perfect for the man who enjoys a light yet long-lasting scent.

With very little fanfare, a small ladies' shoe store on Yonge Street is quietly celebrating its 10th anniversary. The "quiet" part is just fine with owner Howard Share — as long as his clients "quietly" tell their friends.

Invariably they do. Entering its eleventh year, Marquis has become the prime destination of women who want up-to-date, extremely fashionable footwear but need a "comfort fit" that many shoe stores can't provide.

"There are a lot of beautiful shoes out there that fit Cinderella just perfectly," says Share. In the real world, however, women who shoehorn their way into glass slippers usually wind up at the podiatrist.

Wide range of sizes

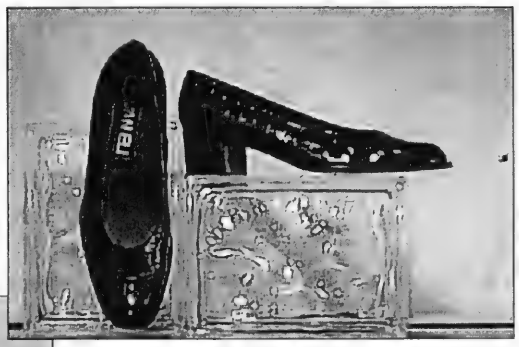
Share's "secret" to good fitting is to offer the latest styles in a wide range of sizes: 4 1/2 to 11B, 7 1/2 to 11AA, and 6 1/2 to 10C and D. It's a formula that works: no ritz and glitz, just fashion forward footwear at very down-to-earth prices.

For fall '97, Marquis is offering a splendid new assortment of Italian classics from Rangoni, Sesto Meucci, Van Eli, and Nickels; Stuart Weitzman, Mr. Seymour and Marinelli from Spain; and Thomas Wallace and La Vallée from Canada. A highlight is La Vallée's winter dress boot that is guaranteed waterproof and salt stain proof (far better than water and stain resistant, which is about as guaranteed as your child's resistance to the cookie jar). Marquis also carries a selection of causal boots, including the tried-and-true, indefatigable Kauffman Sorels — the best on the market, according to Share.

For the High Holidays and other special occasions, you'll find many dignified styles that will carry beautifully to future seasons. For your more casual needs, there are several selections from the ever-popular Naot line from Israel. The Ecco line from Denmark, which has taken Canada by storm with its comfort and styling, is also well-represented at Marquis.

Material treatments are particularly strong this fall and are "flying out the door", according to Share. Choked-up top lines and booties have continued their emergence as mainstream footwear and are worn extensively with long skirts. Marquis' excellent selection of booties will allow you to achieve the fully coordinated look that can be so elusive when shopping for shoes. If you've ever experienced the frustration of shopping at a big store only to discover that sheer numbers of shoes don't guarantee a good selection, you'll be pleasantly surprised by the Marquis experience. Share devotes many hours to the buying process to ensure that his shop has the kind of variety his customers need. "Because we're a small store, we have to make every shoe count," he says.

Waterproof vs. water resistant



Shoes for the High Holidays

The result? Drop in to Marquis at any given time, and you're likely to find a level of activity unmatched by shoe stores several times the size. Though much of this success can be attributed to the aforementioned selection, Share says another factor is the friendly, knowledgeable service you'll receive. "Many of the lines I carry can be found at many other stores, though not necessarily in as wide a size range," he says. "But the feedback I get from women is that they feel comfortable shopping here." Share's clientele includes numerous regulars that are the cornerstone of his business. He rewards their loyalty with personal service and by not sharing his mailing list with other businesses. As in any small business, the owner's in the store; no need to call or write head office.

Give Marquis a try if you're looking for great shoes that fit the bill, literally and figuratively. Tell your friends — quietly. You don't want to give up Toronto's best-kept secret.

Getting turned on by a pair of shoes

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

Some women are attracted by a man's eyes, others by a head of thick curly hair; but when a man turns and walks away, that's when I really get to check them out, because nothing turns me on like a great pair of shoes.

No, not the size – all that we can really surmise from the size of a man's shoes, is that at his age, his father probably wore the same size.

The style, and most importantly, the condition of the shoes, is what I look at. By the way, you can tell a great deal about a man by his shoe choices (right down to what kind of underwear he buys).

Chances are if he takes good care of his shoes and chooses attractive and appropriate styles, your man also pays attention to detail and does many things well. Ladies, if this is important to you, you might want to let your eyes wander downward.

Personally, I love cowboy boots – possibly a little bit of the home on the range fantasy there. Also anything resembling new-wave, such as buckles to one side, has an attraction for me. But I am brought right back and over to the other side when I see a beautiful pair of Brogues draped under the pleating of a well-cut European suit.

Shoes are an accessory that can make or break an outfit. They might whisper efficient, executive, worldly, exciting – or they might just as easily scream geek, bumpkin or wuss. Men, to keep you footloose and in the running, here are some suggestions:

- Never wear dress shoes with jeans. Cowboy boots, or any type of Doc Martins look best.
- The soft boot may score high on the comfort scale but definitely not on a hot date.
- Unless you are a senior citizen retiring to Miami or Palm Springs, do not under any circumstances consider buying a pair of white shiny shoes. (Sorry, Dad)
- Laceups and tassel loafers look best with suits.
- Brogues, like kilts, can actually be quite intriguing.
- If you're planning a vacation to a warm climate this one is very important: Never wear socks with your sandals – unless of course you plan to be wearing your lederhosen with them.

Lunatic Fringe captures hearts, minds of teen and preteen fashion mavens

On that fine November morning in '95 when the residents of Forest Hill awoke to find the northeast corner of Avenue Road and Eglinton engulfed in an explosion of colour, opinion was divided. Depending on who you talked to, the madcap swirls of yellow, green, blue and burnt orange that enveloped the formerly staid CIBC building were either the work of an artistic genius or the perpetration of some lunatic fringe.

Clearly, they're both. Some two years later, Lunatic Fringe is the consensus favourite of teens citywide who come here to shop, to hang out, and to soak up the atmosphere of Toronto's most unique retail environment.

Jean prices always sharp in Toronto's most unique retail environment

What owners Allison Liss and Katy Korman find more gratifying than the financial success, however, is the degree to which the store has been embraced by Toronto's youthful population, so much so that it enjoys an almost cult-like following.

The stunning transformation of the premises at 306 Eglinton Avenue West was merely the title page of a revolutionary new chapter in Canadian retailing. In every aspect of the operation — from merchandising to decor to customer service — this store locks convention in the closet and throws away the key. While Lunatic Fringe's psychedelic facade, deliciously gritty industrial decor and in-store basketball court — where free jeans or some other valuable item goes up for grabs in a daily free throw competition — clearly sets it apart from other stores, the real difference is that this is a store for teens, by teens and of teens. "We don't decide what's cool; they decide," says Liss.

Nor are those decisions limited to the teenage set. Though most customers are age 13 to 18, Lilliputian fashion mavens as young as 9 or 10 have also come to enjoy the Lunatic Fringe experience. Facilitating their fashion odyssey, the store's recent Back to School selection has been expanded to include sizes 7 to 14, everything from the funky to the Mommy-approved clothes for the High Holidays.

The wonderfully hip jeans, tops, dresses and accessories for both guys and girls that check out of "The Fringe" almost as soon as they check in are, in the most part, selected by the teenagers who work here. Many of the labels the shop carries exclusively are sought out in New York and L.A., then submitted to the staff for piece-by-piece dissection and, ultimately, a yea or nay. To ensure that Lunatic Fringe is not only user-friendly but also pocketbook-friendly, the owners and their staff shop the city daily, keeping an eye on prices and setting or lowering theirs accordingly. The high-quality casual clothing Lunatic Fringe carries isn't cheap, but for $10 or less, you can find plenty of treasures here, like the costume jewellery ("a great Bar or Bat mitzvah gift") to neat chatchkes like candles and lava lamps.

Fashion and fun share top billing at Lunatic Fringe

From its reading area featuring teen magazines like Seventeen and really nifty retro cards that Liss hand picks, to its comfy couches and sprawling dungeon-doored dressing rooms, Lunatic Fringe is a compellingly self-indulgent Lunatic Fringe, informal. "Those whose zeal, in some causes, movement, or ism, goes beyond reasonable limits." At 306 Eglinton West, following the fashion dictates of Noah Webster's definition comes naturally.

It pays to know where the hoop is when a free item of clothing goes up for grabs daily mix of fashion, fantasy, and fun that mirrors the exuberance of its clientele. Ironically, however, it's the parents who pay the Fringe its most fitting tribute. They clearly enjoy being here with their children, and vice versa; for a few magical moments, the generation gap narrows to nothingness, and "older" people are young again. You can see it in their eyes; and, if you look closely, you can see it in their feet, surreptitiously tapping to the music as their children boogie.

Arafat must choose: PM

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's most important contribution to the Middle East peace process would be to convince the Palestinian Authority (PA) of the need for genuine and effective action against the terrorist infrastructure within its domain, said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in a recent interview.

Without that, he said, it will be impossible to implement the further redeployments stipulated in the Oslo Accords and subsequent Hebron agreement.

> 'Looking for PA to dismantle terrorist infrastructure'

"The jmmediate thing we're looking for is the Palestinians' fulfilment of the obligations [specified in the Oslo text] to fight terrorism and dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, commitments that have not been fulfilled so far," he said. "If the secretary's trip advances that [goal], it will be an important contribution to peace."

The prime minister said the PA's attitude toward the suppression of terrorism was a grave deviation from the Oslo spirit and intent.

"In effect, the one structural flaw in Oslo is the failure of the Palestinian Authority and of [Chairman Yasser] Arafat to live up to the commitment he gave to prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, namely, 'You give us territory, we'll fight terrorism from that territory.'

"That simply has not happened. The opposite has. We have had an explosive growth of terrorism in the four years of Oslo...Hamas and Islamic Jihad have built terrorist bases and enjoy terrorist safe havens five minutes away from our major cities.

"That has caused the death of 250 Israelis in the first 2½ years [after Oslo], a situation no government can endure, that peace cannot endure. Arafat cannot escape the choice he must make between peace with Hamas and peace with Israel."

Netanyahu then turned to Iran's ballistic missile buildup, in which Russian experts are actively involved. He outlined the possible consequences if the Russian government does not stop the flow of its extensive technological know-how and the export of vital components to the Islamic republic.

"It could change the balance of power in the Middle East," Netanyahu said. "It could [negatively] affect the peace agreements" already existing in the Middle East

VAUGHAN, Ont. — North America's largest Sephardi centre opened here last week amid ululating, cheers, prayers and a vow of eventual Middle East peace from Israel's foreign minister.

The grand opening of the $16-million Sephardic Kehila Centre, just north of Metro Toronto, lived up to the promise of being one of the biggest, most festive events in the Jewish community in a long time. David Levy, Israel's deputy prime minister and foreign minister, joined in the celebration. In the middle of a huge throng, a beaming Levy helped carry one of the sifrai Torah from a small, nearby congregation to the new centre.

Hailed as unique, the 93,000-square-foot building will house Or Haemet Sephardic School, a sanctuary that seats 620, a banquet hall, a swimming pool, underground parking, a mikvah, offices and other amenities. It fulfils the dream of Toronto's approximately 15,000-strong Sephardi community of bringing all its services under one roof, and follows the northward migration of the Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Stern Concerns CJC

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, has expressed concern over "distasteful and discriminatory" comments made by syndicated radio talkshow host Howard Stern.

Stern's morning program made its Canadian debut in Montreal and Toronto last week. During a press conference with the Montreal media, Stern used profanity to describe both individuals and groups.

Conference on Holocaust

EDMONTON — An international conference and art exhibition relating to the Holocaust will be held here in late October.

The conference on human rights and social justice is being sponsored by the University of Alberta's faculties of law and education, the Office of Human Rights, the Centre for Constitutional Studies and the Office of the President of the University of Alberta.

The conference will address legal, moral, political, cultural and esthetic meanings of the Holocaust and their continuing significance to contemporary social and intellectual life.

ISRAEL

Israelis Convicted

JERUSALEM — Two members of the right-wing organization Zo Artzeinu (This Is Our Land) were convicted last week in connection with a series of anti-government protests they led during the summer and fall of 1995.

During that period, activists in the group blocked traffic along major roads across the country, in a series of protests against the peace policies of then prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Moshe Feiglin and Shmuel Sackett were convicted of sedition and distributing publications calling for sedition during those protests.

But the Jerusalem Magistrates Court acquitted the two on seven separate charges of incitement. Sentencing of the two will take place at a later date.

WORLD

Hotel Gaza

WASHINGTON — The largest Arab American lobby group is urging a boycott of the Days Inn hotel chain to protest the opening of a resort hotel in an Israeli settlement.

The American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee has expressed "grave concern" about the location of a Days Inn franchise in Gush Katif in the Gaza Strip.

The heavily fortified settlement bloc, which is the largest part of Gaza still under Israeli control, has been a source of tension between Israelis and Palestinians.

German-Iranian Ties

FRANKFURT — Germany has announced that it wants to re-establish ties with Iran.

The announcement came as Russia categorically denied media reports in Israel that it is helping Iran develop ballistic missiles.

Statements by top German officials came in response to an offer last week by Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi to reopen contacts with the European Union.

Chancellor Helmut Kohl told reporters the changes going on in Tehran could not be ignored.

Orthodox Convention

SPRING GLEN, N.Y. — Leaders and members of 22 major Orthodox Jewish organizations in North America will convene Nov. 27 to 30 at the Homowack Resort Hotel in Spring Glen to address current challenges faced by rabbinic, educational and lay organizations.

The Conference of the World Council of Orthodox Leadership (North American Section) and the World Council for Torah Education will focus on the theme Translating Vision into Reality.

Gay Shul Gets First Rabbi

CHICAGO — Twenty-two years after it was founded, Congregation Or Chadash, Chicago's only gay and lesbian congregation, has hired its first permanent rabbi.

The Reform-affiliated temple named Rabbi Suzanne Griffel, 35, to head its 120-member congregation. The members wanted a rabbi who would focus on outreach and growth, Griffel said.

Discovery at Buchenwald

FRANKFURT — Hundreds of unknown victims of the Buchenwald concentration camp have finally found a resting place.

More than 700 urns containing human ashes were found in May by carpenters working on the roof of the crematorium at the camp, located on a mountain near Weimar, about 125 miles southwest of Berlin.

The ashes were buried late last month in a cemetery for victims of Buchenwald during an ecumenical ceremony led by Frankfurt Rabbi Menachem Klein.

Manuscript Competition

NEW JERSEY — The Association of Jewish Libraries has launched the 13th annual Sydney Taylor Manuscript Competition for aspiring authors of Jewish books.

A cash award of $1,000 will be given for the best fiction manuscript appropriate for readers ages eight to 11, written by an unpublished author. For entry forms and rules, contact Paula Sandfelder, coordinator, 1327 Wyntercreek Lane, Dunwoody, Ga. 30338.

Back to School?

JERUSALEM — Firebombings of Jewish schools occasionally occur in Europe.

But no one expected kindergarten children in Israel looking forward to their first day of school to be affected by such an attack.

Late on Sunday night, Aug. 31, a firebomb was thrown through the window of a kindergarten operated by the Reform movement in Mevasseret Zion, a suburb of Jerusalem.

Police said they have not yet found any suspects.

The attack took place at a time of heightened religious tensions in Israel, where the non-Orthodox movements have been seeking an increased role in the country's religious life, which until now has been under the sole control of the Orthodox.

The private school, which is located in a rented apartment, was almost completely destroyed. It serves about 40 children between the ages of three and five, and had been scheduled to open its doors Sept. 1, the first day of Israel's new school year.

Lively parade recreated spirit of Kensington

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You didn't have to be Jewish to enjoy the recent Ashkenaz parade which began in Kensington Market and wound its way down Spadina Avenue to Harbourfront Centre, the main venue of Ashkenaz, the festival of new Yiddish culture.

Many of the parade spectators were shoppers and retailers from the Chinese community. Chinese merchants are now located in many of the retail spaces occupied by Jewish shop keepers in the early decades of this century.

Before the parade, some 600 people gathered in Bellevue Square Park in Kensington Market. They donned cardboard and plastic headgear, including menorahs, sewing machines and musical instruments, and collected banners with the names of businesses such as Tip Top Tailors Sherman's Hardware, and Silverstein's Bakery – all in the Kensington Market-Spadina Avenue area, the hub of Toronto Jewish life from the 1920s until the end of the 1940s.

Theatre artist Ann Barber, director and choreographer of the Ashkenaz parade, told The CJN the parade theme was the early roots of the Toronto Jewish community during the colorful immigrant era when eastern European shtetl life was transplanted to Canada.

The parade was designed "to recreate the spirit of the old Kensington market," she said. "We wanted to try to jolt people's memory of it."

She said her husband, theatre artist Brad Harley, spent weeks researching the various businesses and history of the old neighborhood and based the art work of the parade – banners, masks, 15-foot puppets – on nostalgic images of the era.

The husband and wife and five other local artists worked full time for a month at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, where they were assisted by volunteers to create the puppets and other art work.

The seven 15-foot puppets with four-foot high papier-mache heads represented elements of Jewish life: a bearded rabbi, klezmer musicians and a bubbie carrying a bowl of chicken soup. There was even a puppet with the likeness of Francis Lenzer, known as the button waitress, who worked at The Bagel on College Street for 32 years.

Funding IN Action
UJA FEDERATION

Last Pesach, "Elana" wanted to do something special for her three children. She learned that Jewish Family and Child Service, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, also supported by UJA Federation, was conducting a Seder, so she called to get tickets. That call changed her life.

A DIFFICULT PAST

The past few years have been tough for Elana's family. After divorcing her husband, Elana needed support to get her life together for her three children. "It is very difficult to be a single parent," Elana notes. "It's hard when you are not able to provide for your children. Every penny counts and even that is not nearly enough."

Elana went to many other agencies for support without receiving any significant results. Only Simon Kalkstein, the downtown supervisor at JF & CS, "made a difference," says Elana.

A NEW BEGINNING

Elana's daughter, "Leah", 16, believes that a 'guardian angel' has been sent to watch over her family. "Simon has helped us so much. He is in a way, like a father figure for us. He's always there when we need him, even if it's just to say hi."

Leah's brothers "Joseph," 13, and "Ben," 9 have been able to go to camp this year because of UJA funding through Jewish Family and Child Service. "The three weeks that I was at camp were amazing. I did things that I never thought I would, like waterskiing. It was awesome!," says Joseph.

Today Elana is studying philosophy at the University of Toronto in hope of pursuing a criminology career. "I am very optimistic about our future – I feel that Simon has rescued us."

For more than 125 years, the emotional, social and physical needs of Toronto's Jewish community have been served by Jewish Family and Child Service. It's another example of UJA Federation Funding in Action.

A revealing silence on Algerian murders

Last week in this column, I wrote about the carnage and grisly slaughter presently ongoing in Algeria.

Without meaning to be lurid, but in order to convey an understanding of the nature of the horror unfolding there, I included brief excerpts of the sketchy accounts of the massacres that are being reported in the western media.

It appears the slaying pace has picked up considerably.

Between the writing of that column and the appearance of last week's paper, more massacres took place.

The following Associated Press report appeared in the Globe and Mail of Aug. 30: "Hooded men armed with axes descended on an isolated farm village (Rais) before dawn yesterday, slitting the throats of sleeping residents or decapitating them. Villagers and hospital workers said more than 300 people were killed.

"The attack appeared to be the worst carnage since Algeria's Islamic insurgency began five years ago, although it was not clear who carried it out."

The Daily Telegraph of London reported that up to 1,000 people were killed in Algeria during the week that ended on Aug. 30. The extent of the outrage finally evoked a response from UN Secretary General Kofi Anan, who said: "The world cannot stand by and let this happen."

Even the Pope was finally moved to comment two Sundays ago, saying that he was appalled by the bloodletting. And the Vatican's newspaper denounced the "ice-cold indifference" by the international community to the violence.

But the murders continue.

Between the appearance of last week's issue of The CJN and the writing of this column, the following Associated Press report appeared in the Toronto Star on Sept. 7:

"Hatchet-swinging attackers 'howling like jackals' descended on a secluded neighborhood outside Algiers (Beni Messous), kicking open doors and slitting the throats of entire families.

"At least 87 died in the nighttime massacre."

The sheer magnitude and frequency of the outrages have meant that the western media can no longer ignore what has been happening during these past five years in Algeria. And indeed, if the past two weeks are any indication, more and more stories about the war seem to be creeping into the news. However, it is still true to say, as I did, that "very little of the war's dirty, repulsive details" ever make whether by scimitar or by civility, would pose significant threats to the governments in neighboring Egypt, Tunisia, Morocco and even Jordan, it to the west.

The reasons are manifold.

One of them is simply due to the fact that journalists and reporters have been targeted for death. At first, the harassment and persecutions were carried out by the military regime. When democratic process was suspended in 1992, the generals made certain to mute the sounds of the keyboards clicking their stories, mostly critical, to other parts of the world.

According to Anna Husarska in an article that appeared in the New Republic last year, Reporters sans frontieres had reported that 61 journalists had been killed by July 1996 by the Islamic militants. Hundreds have left the country as a result.

"Most journalists," she wrote, "are killed outside their homes when, as they do from time to time, especially on religious holidays, they venture out of their fortresses to visit parents, go see their kids or their spouses. The guidelines are strict; never stay more than thirty minutes, or the terrorists will have time to mobilize their gunmen.

French economic interests

"The Groupe Islamique Arme (GIA) has made its policy clear: those who fight with their pens will die by the sword."

Given the frightening ruthlessness aimed at journalists in Algeria, it is indeed quite remarkable and quite heroic, that any stories are being written and filed in Algeria.

But if Algeria itself is a "difficult" forum from which to publicize the five-year reign of wanton butchery, one might assume that at least the General Assembly or the Security Council might be a reasonable forum from which to urgently bring the matter to the attention of the wider, western world.

But that too has not happened. In contrast to the way in which the General Assembly and the Security Council quickly mobilize to sit in predetermined judgement over virtually every aspect of Israel's behavior, they have yet to convene either in plenary or in committee, to consider how to stop the slaughter in Algeria.

Simply put, too many governments – in Africa, the Middle East, and in Europe – do not want the civil war to receive too high a profile.

The government of Algeria wants to find the balance between shedding sufficient light on the atrocities, so as to gain the sympathy of the world, and maintaining sufficient shadow over its own role in the atrocities.

The overthrow of the Algerian government by the fundamentalists, all of whom worry about sizable local followings of their indigenous Muslim militants.

These governments are wary lest they are perceived by their respective peoples as too "pro-western." At the same time they are also wary of the rise of fanatic fundamentalism. The rise of militant Islam would predictably result in a large outflow of people from these countries. Most of them would head to western Europe.

But western Europe at this time, would be a most inhospitable place for them. And hence, the relative silence from them too. Right wing governments or vocal oppositions in England, Germany and especially France, have already aroused the prejudices and suspicions of local populations against a high-profile Muslim presence.

Between 10 and 13 million Muslims live in western Europe. The largest group, five million, live in France. Therefore it is clearly in these countries and especially France's interest to adopt low profile policies on Algeria's "internal" situation.

According to a New York Times report in October 1995, France is Algeria's largest creditor, providing about $1 billion worth of loans and grants. France also imported about $1 billion worth of Algerian natural gas. It therefore cannot risk its economic interests in Algeria. The overthrow of the current secular government in Algeria would certainly threaten French interests.

On the other hand, for the sake of maintaining good relations with fundamentalist Muslim elements within its own borders, neither can it appear to be endorsing hard-line tactics against the hoodlums, villains and thugs in Algeria whose ideology many of the militants in France share

It is apparent, and has ever been, that Israel's conflicts with its neighbors are much more palatable "proofs" of the collective conscience of the members of the European Union, and in particular that of France, than are the conflicts among or within Muslim states.

The Europeans do not lobby the Arab governments as forcefully as they do Israel. They are clearly more comfortable hectoring Israel because it stands them in greater stead with larger portions of their local populations Regular turns at keeping a judicious silence on certain matters while "bashing" the Jewish state on other matters makes for good domestic politics. MBD

Opposition mounting to new messianic 'synagogue'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Fierce opposition is mounting to a new messianic "synagogue" in the heart of Jewish Thornhill, with area merchants, Jewish groups and a city councillor cranking up the rhetoric.

The presence of the City of David Messianic Synagogue in the Main Exchange strip mall at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue is "an affront" to the Jewish community, says Thornhill Ward 5 councillor Bernie Green.

Green told The CJN he will "look into what actions can be taken" against the congregation, but stressed that the City of Vaughan can't get involved officially because the facility "seems to comply" with zoning and planning regulations.

"I don't believe it should be there," Green added. "It's reaching out just to the Jewish community."

Last Friday, about a dozen demonstrators – mainly Orthodox students and people once affiliated with the Jewish Defence League – staged a protest outside the congregation, with placards denouncing it as a deceptive device to lure Jews. Despite some angry words exchanged with passers-by, they promised regular protests to "shut the place down," in the words of one demonstrator.

The congregation, with its dominating outdoor sign, is part of the growing so-called messianic Jewish movement, which teaches that Jews should accept Jesus as their messiah [CJN, Sept. 4].

Jewish groups are outraged at the congregation's location, saying it's in a heavily Jewish area. They fear that as similar groups have done, it will target vulnerable Jews, such as recent immigrants and the young, for conversion to Christianity.

The congregation shares a parking lot with kosher shops, an Israel-style restaurant and the office of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY). It's also near the newly opened Sephardic Kehila Centre, and in an area with a large population of Russian-Jewish immigrants.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group, have slammed City of David as an evangelical church masquerading as a synagogue, especially since it has Hebrew on its sign, uses Jewish symbols and touts services for Jewish holidays. They're promising a rough ride for the congregation.

CJC's Ontario region has written the plaza's property manager, Mount Batten Properties, claiming the congregation is "a Christian proselytizing group" and stating that Congress has received "a rash of complaints" about it.

CJC says the property manager "may have some legal recourse in cancelling" the congregation's recently-signed six-year lease.

Jews for Judaism, in its letter to the property manager, says City of David "is absolutely not a synagogue but an evangelical Protestant church," and notes that Toronto's Jewish community "is exceedingly upset for being so blatantly targeted for conversion."

Jews for Judaism plans to hold a town hall meeting at the end of this month to air the community's concerns over City of David.

Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY, says the community needs to be "mobilized" against the congregation, and he's calling on other Jewish youth groups for help with future action.

He says messianic flyers have been distributed to merchants in the plaza.

"When that happened, it really hit home," he said.

"They're not stupid," Rabbi Black said of the congregation. "They know where they are, and why. This is very much an 'us versus them' problem."

He says he's received "tons of complaints" from his members and the public and that there is "tremendous tension" among merchants in the plaza.

The rabbi has combed through his group's lease and found a clause prohibiting tenants from engaging in deceptive advertising or selling. He says that may form a basis for a complaint, since it's "reasonable" to say the group is not a synagogue.

"If they called themselves a church, that would be more honest," Rabbi Black says.

The manager of Goodfield's Meats, a kosher-style butcher and food shop right next to the congregation, says most of his customers are not happy about City of David. "It's not good for anybody, but there's nothing we can do about it."

Azim Wali, owner of the kosher Not Just Yogurt shop, also next door to the congregation, says City of David is having an adverse effect on his business. He says he's seeing fewer children in the store, likely because parents are keeping them away.

City of David's spiritual leader, Jeff Forman, a self-described "messianic rabbi," says "some people" are "uptight" about his congregation, but he's unfazed by accusations that it's deceptive.

"We are Jewish people who believe in Jesus," he said. "Our motives are pure."

Lenzer herself wore a kiss-my-bagel button. She said she was thrilled that the parade organizers had singled her out for this special honor.

Other puppets included a bride and groom carried in a mock wedding procession under a chupah.

There were other large-scale cardboard and papier mache items associated with Jewish life in this era – a huge platter of corn beef on rye sandwiches, three-foot hats from the late colorful hatter, Sammy Taft, and a giant Singer sewing machine.

Parade participants spanned three generations. Decked out in costumes and carrying banners, they walked, roller-bladed or rolled along in strollers, accompanied by an assortment of klezmer musicians led by David Buchbinder, artistic director of Ashkenaz.

Stretching two blocks, the colorful procession made its way through Kensington Market, and when it reached the Minsker Shul on St. Andrew Street, a 10-foot blue angel puppet called the Naivelt (New World) Angel emerged from the shul to greet the marchers.

They spontaneously began dancing and clapping to the klezmer music for 15 minutes and then enthusiastically headed down Spadina Avenue, much to the pleasure of hundreds of bystanders lining the street.

Greater Toronto Area

Toronto nightclub to be used for holiday services

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of midtown Toronto's trendiest nightspots will be transformed into a temporary house of worship during the High Holy Days.

Berlin Restaurant and Nightclub, better known for its dining and dancing, will give itself over to prayer for the two days of Rosh Hashanah. Yom Kippur services will be held at the nearby North Toronto Collegiate Institute on Roehampton Avenue.

The Village Shul, in cooperation with Aish Hatorah, is promoting the unique venues as a way of reaching out to young people in the Yonge and Eglinton area.

Rhonda Halpern, a spokesperson for the pilot project, said "we wanted a hip location. We're providing a traditional service at a very unconventional location."

"We're offering a traditional service for non-traditional Jews," said Rabbi Yakov Palatnik, spiritual leader at the Village Shul on Eglinton Avenue. "We want to get to people who are not comfortable in a traditional large synagogue setting and to attract people looking for something different and something educational."

With that in mind, the Village Shul and its volunteer helpers are planning a two-pronged approach to High Holy Day services. In the main dance floor/sanctuary area of the "Yonge Shul," a traditional service will be offered, officiated by knowledgeable volunteers who will make sure the congregants keep up with the proceedings, Halpern said.

Special classes

Meanwhile, in other areas of the club (and later at the school), "the main attraction" of the days' events will be special classes on various aspects of Judaism. Topics include the soul in the afterlife, the seduction of Adam and Eve, the true meaning of Rosh Hashanah and how to get prayers answered.

The one-hour classes will run concurrently with the traditional services, she said. They'll be taught by rabbis, rebbetzins and learned lay people and it's expected people will shift between the classes and the services throughout the day.

Those wishing to take a break from prayer or study can pick up a book and read at the impromptu library that will be set up at the sanctuary's periphery, Halpern added.

In addition to the Village Shul and now the "Yonge Shul," Aish Hatorah will run services in its main site on Clark Street in Thornhill as well as at the "Country Shul" in Richmond Hill and at the "Uptown Shul," (located downstairs at the Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue). In addition, Aish Hatorah will provide educational classes at the Beth Jacob Synagogue, Magen David Sephardic Congregation and at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre.

While operating prayer and educational programs in unconventional settings is nothing new for the Village Shul or Aish Hatorah (spillover from the Village Shul has been held in a local Chinese restaurant for years), doing so in a nightclub is something of a departure for the two groups. Aish Hatorah volunteer Cindy Himelstein was the mastermind behind the project and the person whose hard work turned the concept into reality, Halpern said.

About 200 people are expected to attend the services. Tickets are priced at $75 and a tax receipt will be issued. Free babysitting will be offered as well as youth programs for children eight to 12. For more information, call 416-787-2444.

Meanwhile, an Eglinton Avenue tradition will return during the High Holy Days as the Village Shul will host an outdoor High Holy Day kiddush. In the past, about 300 people have attended the sidewalk event. This year, it will be held at 10:30 a.m. on both days of Rosh Hashanah, Rabbi Palatnik said.

Death's straight line

In the double-speak language of the insincere world of the prevaricating leader of the Palestinian Authority (PA), the hastily assembled meeting last weekend in Cairo with Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Hussein was yet the latest example of a show without content, of a posture without spine, of deliverance without rescue.

The three men dutifully embraced and held their positions long enough for the cameras to flash and for their images to be sent all over the world. But it was all a pose, the suggestion of solidarity among the Arab seekers of peace, a boost-by-association with the "moderates" for the PA chairman's credibility as he prepares to meet Madeleine Albright, making her first visit to the region as U.S. secretary of state, later this week.

But the pose is now tedious; and the main poseur, Yasser Arafat, a pretentious, pitiful pretender.

As reported by the CBC, the trio issued a press communique that apparently called upon Israel "to refrain from actions alien to the spirit of peace."

Presumably they had in mind the closure of the territories to Palestinian workers, the increased number of arrests of known or suspected Hamas members, and the other heightened security measures Israel has implemented in the aftermath of the triple bombings on Ben Yehuda last week.

Presumably they did not have in mind the highly-demonstrative, grotesque, public two-day clasp by Arafat two weeks earlier, of the most notorious haters and murderers among his Palestinian colleagues. Nor was it likely they had in mind the succinct, unambiguous clarion to his people by Arafat that "all options were open" in the struggle against Israel.

There is a straight line, easily drawn in the minds of decent people, between Arafat's kiss on Hamas leader al-Rantisi's cheeks, and the deaths of young innocents on the streets of Jerusalem, only five weeks after the Hamas-engineered Machane Yehuda bombings.

Even if Israelis concede that Arafat cannot reign in all the terror cells intent on killing Jews, they cannot and will not concede to him the propriety, for any purpose, of embracing Hamas and effectively approving their subsequent mission of murder.

When she arrives in the region, Albright will have a very difficult, if not impossible, task. She must persuade Israel that Arafat is a reliable peace partner. Under present circumstances, having regard to the company Arafat keeps and to the pronouncements he makes, her chances of success are quite slim.

And the world mourned

The outpouring of worldwide affection for the late Princess of Wales was startling. Nothing in her life foretold the depth of the emotion that ordinary folk around the world felt for her. She led a Hollywood life and met a Hollywood end. Ironically, this was inadvertently confirmed through the elegiac song by Elton John that was her eulogy. Alas, it was a sad Hollywood ending and the world mourned a life cut short.

By contrast, everything in the life of Mother Teresa did foretell the outpouring of love and affection that accompanied her death. She was a rare individual, selflessly, totally dedicated to the welfare of the poorest and most needy of her fellow human beings, an example of unparalleled human goodness.

And the world mourned a life that lived to its final full exhaustion.

Bombers will pay for their crimes

Throughout history, we as Jews have scratched out an existence for ourselves without really learning the bitter lessons of the past. How many times must we be faced with the kind of antagonism and impairment that we are facing now in Israel, only to react with approbation instead of with swift and lasting results?

Too many times we have bowed to the pressures put upon us by the international community, while UN aid and sympathy continue to pour in to the "besieged" Palestinian people, only to watch them exploit this valuable commodity so that they may continue to exercise their covenant against the Jews, a covenant that regurgitates hatred and breeds martyrs with an insatiable appetite for blowing up innocent people, whose only crime it was to be in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Moral justice cries out for retribution against any nation that would seek the destruction of the Jewish people. Those that would test our wills and challenge our patience by harming the children of Israel should know that there isn't any corner of the world small enough for them to hide in before paying for their crimes.

Instead of fighting amongst ourselves over religious freedoms, the proponents of Israel should take seriously the business of self-preservation. Otherwise, we only lend support to our enemies by doing to ourselves what they have tried so long to do. Will we learn the lessons of the past in time or will the answers be too little and arrive many Jewish lives too late?

Wagner debases all Jews, not only survivors

Rabbi Gunther Plaut's feelings and conclusions in The Wagner Controversy (CJN, Aug. 28), in which he quotes an article by Lili Eylon, was written with deep understanding and sensitivity of Wagner's anti-Jewish sentiments.

But Eylon, in her writing is naive when she states that the argument for playing Wagner in Israel "does not centre around the quality of his music...nor is the argument about how deep-seated was his anti-Semitism really relevant."

Richard Wagner started from two premises in his treatises: that Jews were alien in thought and feeling, and therefore could not express themselves in German art; and that even if Jews thought and felt like Germans, they would have succeeded no better.

Wagner maintained that "it is necessary for us to explain the involuntary repugnance we possess for the nature and personality of the Jews." He proceeded to castigate the Jews' outward appearance, "which has something disagreeably foreign about it" and Jewish speech in which "our attention dwells involuntarily on its repulsiveness."

Therefore, Wagner concluded that the Jew is incapable of giving artistic enunciation to his feelings through talk, and it is even more difficult for Jews to enunciate through song, for "song is talk aroused to the highest passion, and music is the speech of passion."

This philosophy is further exhibited in his operas, such as Das Rheingold. There, the evil, ugly, hook dwarf Albrecht appears, and from him emanates grotesque sounds and grunts in the Wagnerian styled "Jewish inflections."

In the 1869 version of Judaism in Music, Wagner states that the alternative to Jews casting aside their racial heritage would simply be "the uprooting, expulsion or destruction of these people." The closing sentence of this essay suggests the solution of der untergang, meaning "going under," or more accurately, "annihilation."

When Wagner applied anti-Semitism to the structure of German nationalism, he swept along the millions of Germans predisposed to the hatred of Jews. Wagner's contribution was "proof" that Jewish blood was incapable of producing creative work.

It is therefore not only to "Jewish survivors of the Nazi horror that Wagner's music represents a vivid reminder of that regime," as Eylon writes. It is a reminder to all of us who value decency, respect and integrity.

Klein is reigning Jewish poet

Harry Heft's article on the 25th anniversary of A.M. Klein's death (CJN, Aug. 28), leaves one thinking about the following lines from Irving Layton's poem Requiem For A. M. Klein: "And the sentimentality each clever Jew/ Misconstrues for sensitivity:/ Fool's gold which you, O alchemist,/ Changed into precious metal, solid and true."

The emphasis will always be on what Klein wrote and not on what he didn't write. Few if any have equalled his literary achievements and he is still the reigning Jewish poet in this country. Like all great artists, Klein continues to live through his work.

Jerusalem mall a scene of carnage, death

By MICHAEL S. ARNOLD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Dan Vered had planned a nice Thursday evening in downtown Jerusalem: a meal at his favorite restaurant one block from Ben Yehuda Street, a cigar from a nearby tobacconist and then a stroll up and down the pedestrian mall that is the heart of the city's commercial area.

Vered's evening did not turn out as pleasantly as he had planned.

A trio of suicide bombers, standing roughly 11 yards apart in the shape of a triangle, had turned "the salon of Jerusalem" into a scene of carnage and destruction.

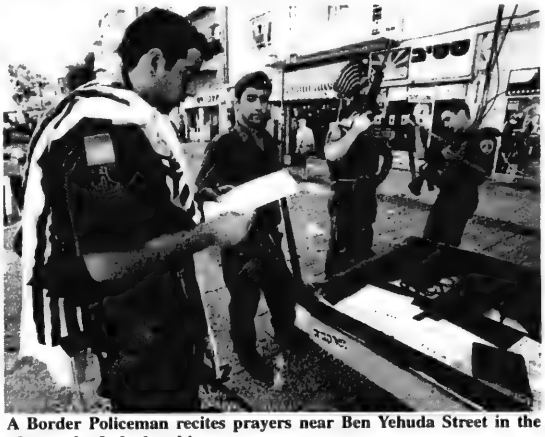
As the casualty toll reached at least seven dead, including the suspected bombers – and more than 180 injured – residents, shopkeepers and spectators on the scene tried to make sense of the bombing as they watched police and burial-society workers clean glass, charred flesh and bits of merchandise from the street.

Teenage girls sat on doorstoops, crying and consoling one another. A group of Orthodox Jews stepped off a bus near downtown and began praying.

Stunned civilians walked aimlessly, hands pressed to their chests. And shopkeepers on the streets adjacent to Ben Yehuda engaged in heated arguments about the political process.

"If the Israeli powers don't go inside to the territories, there will be no peace in this country," said Efi Hasut, standing in the doorway of his Charisma hair salon 30 feet from the site of the bombing.

"If they don't kick Arafat out of the country, it will be a disaster for this generation and the next generation."



A Border Policeman recites prayers near Ben Yehuda Street in the aftermath of the bombings.

Outside Hasut's shop, nervous spectators strained from behind police barricades to catch a glimpse of Ben Yehuda Street, which was littered with overturned cafe tables and chairs, broken glass and random pieces of clothing.

Workers from the chevrah kadishah, the religious burial society, picked remains of human flesh from sewer grates, iron grills and tree branches.

Police gingerly cut a green shirt from the torso of one of the alleged suicide bombers, pulling back an orange sheet to reveal the man's black curly hair and a face half blown away by the powerful bomb.

Policemen occasionally stooped to pick up two-inch nails, packed inside the bombs, from the sidewalk.

"Who did we make peace with? With garbage, with the devil," said taxi driver Yoav Zaken, gesturing animatedly to his friend Itzhak Shabbat.

Asking Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to provide security for Israelis, he said, "is like asking the cat to guard the milk."

"This will never end," Shabbat responded. "They don't want us here in this land."

Hours after the bombing, police still were working to clean up as a crowd of people stared dumbfounded at the area.

Normally bustling in the evening hours with families strolling and tourists sipping cappuccino, Ben Yehuda on Thursday night was lit up by television spotlights and the sound of glass crunching underfoot.

"For hours afterward, I couldn't get out of my chair. I was shaking – like this," a woman who identified herself only as Yaffa said, fluttering her hands. "My heart is broken."

Yaffa's friend Aviva Shako sat in her jewelry store, three shopfronts from the deadly intersection, and pointed out objects broken in the blast.

A broken bronze menorah lay at her feet. The ground outside her store had been littered with severed body parts, Shako said, shuddering at the memory.

In the minutes after the blasts, Henke said, dazed victims had flooded into his store, ducking behind counters, seeking any kind of shelter. He had dispensed water and food to calm them and was now trying to come to terms with the catastrophe himself.

"We're still in shock. We're still not thinking straight," Henke said, pointing out a dark stain on the sidewalk that he said had come from a chunk of bloody flesh that landed outside his store.

"Business will suffer a lot, but we'll stay open; if we close, they win."

Outside the store, Vered, a regular customer, said he would follow through with as much of his evening plan, dinner and a cigar, as he could.

"This is my lawyer's office here, this is my bank, this is where I sit and drink coffee and read the paper. This is really my area," Vered said. "The reason I came down here is to prove that they're not going to kill Jerusalem. They can't kill our plans, that's the bottom line."

Others, however, said the psychological fallout from the attack was more severe.

American Leah Colmer, who was eating lunch a few blocks from Ben Yehuda and reached the scene just after the bombings, said she would never be able to look at the area in the same way.

"I said to myself, this is happening, this is really happening. I couldn't pretend that I was living at Disneyland just because I have an American passport," said Colmer, who had rushed to Ben Yehuda, where she helped comfort dazed survivors.

To walk down the lively pedestrian mall "usually is a fun and social scene," she said. "Today it wasn't, it was a life and death experience. It cost people their lives."

Opinions

Water still a fundamental issue

Most people think that our disagreements with the Palestinians are about land: Who occupies and controls which land? That may be true superficially, but fundamentally the clash is over water. In the history of civilization, empires have risen and fallen in the struggle for control of the precious water sources without which no nation can live.

By Carl Alpert in Haifa

Israel is today engaged in a life and death battle, not over a street in Hebron or a colony on the Golan, but over control of the sources of this life-giving element, without which agriculture, industry and the human population itself can not subsist. Experts have raised the warning cry almost since the creation of the state, but successive governments have been criminally derelict in virtually neglecting the problem. A couple of years of drought – and Israel has had several such periods – have stimulated the beginnings of some action, but an ensuing few years of ample rainfall seemed to solve the problem and the emergency was all but forgotten.

The crisis still exists. The other day Israel's Water Commissioner, Meir Ben-Meir, sounded the alarm that within the coming decade, there would not be enough water for the needs of agriculture and the water taps in private homes would run dry. His warning barely rated a few paragraphs in the press. The public has become accustomed to periodic alarms on the subject.

In 1991, in the midst of a drought, State comptroller Miriam Ben-Porat stated that as a result of 25 years of irresponsible mismanagement, Israel faced a water catastrophe. That made headlines, but a year of heavy rainfalls thereafter allayed fears.

One-third of Israel's water supply comes from underground aquifers which are fed from the hills in the West Bank. Giving a Palestinian entity exclusive control over this area means that they would be able to drill and divert these waters away from Israel, or even, because of faulty or careless management, bring about pollution of these sources.

Another major source of Israel's supply comes from the headwaters which feed the Jordan River and the Sea of Galilee, in effect our only sizeable reservoir. More than 30 years ago, Syria began to construct dams to divert these waters away from Israel. The Syrian program was disrupted by Israeli tanks and planes, which put an effective end to these efforts three years before the occupation of the Golan Heights.

In the glow of then-premier Shimon Peres' call for a new Middle East, an agreement was signed with the Palestinians, not only calling for sharing of the water, but also giving them a degree of control. One senior Israeli involved in the negotiations privately warned that "what we are doing now is not shooting ourselves in the foot, but shooting ourselves in the head."

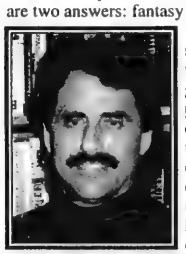
The last few years have brought relatively ample rainfall. Is there assurance that next year will be the same? In the meantime, Israel's population and agricultural requirements have been growing at a rapid pace. What must be done? For a while, there was cockeyed talk of an agreement with Turkey, whereby that country would ship us water in tankers! Some reliance is being placed on recycling of sewage and some water supplies from the source are available for agriculture.

Desalination of water is technologically feasible, but still extremely expensive. Research and technical studies each year manage to bring this cost down, but not enough. Why is the government not allocating the millions, perhaps even the billions of dollars required to make desalination economically feasible? Surely, this is no less important to the survival of Israel, than all the planes and military hardware.

In the meantime, this precious commodity must be handled with care. Undoubtedly we must reach a sharing understanding with the Palestinians (an agreement to that effect was signed recently with Jordan) but on no account can we afford to yield up control of the sources to hands which are at best irresponsible, and at worst, hostile.

Lady Di, peace and the Mideast

What could the late Princess Diana, peace and the Middle East possibly have in common? Well, there are two answers: fantasy and hope.



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

For the past several days, the world has been gripped by the princess' tragic death. Why? Fantasy – her life, and death touched our dreams. That's why television networks have spent millions of dollars pumping the airwaves with unending stories of a sweet, beautiful princess who had a tragic life and a tragic end.

Only a handful of the millions who mourned her loss ever met or knew Diana. And I am sure the real Diana, Princess of Wales, was a very different woman than the immortal "Queen of Hearts" symbol, which she has become. The real Diana is irrelevant for the public. It is the metaphysical Diana that counts, because without fantasy and dreams, what are we?

Peace in the Middle East is also a Dianaesque dream, somehow out of reach, somehow perfect because it is not at hand, somehow a Utopian dream. But without that dream, without at least the chance of realizing it, there is no national soul in this country. There is no hope.

Through her death, Diana inspired the world. Remembered was her contribution to helping AIDS patients, land mine victims; forgotten was the titillating gossip about her affairs. Like Diana, when Yitzhak Rabin was felled by an assassin's bullet, he became a "Saint for Peace" in the eyes of the world and in the Jewish State. He was remembered for his bold and courageous decisions to carve a new path towards reconciliation with the Palestinians; forgotten was the heated public controversy.

Israelis want to remember the dream

Israelis, like all other human beings, want to remember the dream, the hope for peace, Rabin's efforts to reach the Utopian Holyland.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu now says forget dreams, forget a real peace with the Arabs, forget Shimon Peres' vision of a new economically linked Middle East.

Netanyahu wants us to stop dreaming, stop striving for change. He wants us to accept the bitter status quo of mutual hatred and mutual bloodshed, of living by the gun. He says he wants to shatter the Rabin-inspired illusions.

Maybe Rabin was driven by dreams, maybe he pursued mirages, maybe he aspired to something unattainable; but if we don't aspire, if humanity doesn't dream or fantasize, then we do not have the drive to change at least a little of our always tough reality.

If Theodor Herzl didn't dream, there would be no Zionism – nor Israel. Being realistic, as Netanyahu says, would never have motivated a bunch of crazy pioneers to come to what was a malaria-infested desert wasteland to build a Jewish State.

The national anthem echoes exactly what Netanyahu wants Israelis to forget. It is called Hatikvah (The Hope), the very hope this prime minister is trying to suck out of this battle-fatigued nation.

Check out the mood in Israel these days. No one is investing, no one is building, people are down, uninspired, lacking in direction. Netanyahu is definitely doing his job. His government is killing the spirit of this nation.

Without that spirit there is no will to fight, no will to sacrifice. Without the ability to hope for peace, there is no tool to aspire to a better future for our children. Netanyahu is succeeding in doing what very few Arab leaders have achieved: he is damaging the soul of this nation.

Without Dianaesque dreams, what do we really have? Only our grim reality.

Russian Jews in Germany

Only a few years ago, the idea that any Jew would voluntarily choose to live in Germany seemed impossible. When World War II was over, there were still more than 100,000 of our people in the country, but when the majority had left, only some 20,000 remained – Jews who had been imported by the Nazis as slave laborers from Eastern Europe. They were, on the whole, a dispirited lot, waiting to leave and settle elsewhere. Most former German Jews – of whom there were some 600,000 when I was young – never did return, and those now in the country considered themselves "Jews in Germany" but not "German Jews."

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

All this changed slowly in the decades to follow. Some Jews arrived from Iraq, others from Israel and assorted places in Europe – all of them attracted by the sudden Wirtschaftswunder, the German economic miracle. About 10 years ago, their number had swelled to 30,000 and the majority, if they were asked where they wanted to live, would have said, "not here."

But no longer. Inter Nationes, a German government agency that promotes visits to Germany, has published a special survey written by Susan Stern, entitled Jews in Germany Today – Dynamic Growth, Dramatic Change. It indicates that 60,000 Jewish immigrants have come from the former Soviet Union, swelling the Jewish population to 100,000 or more. It is anticipated that in another few years, with Russian Jews arriving at the rate of 700 a month, two-thirds or more of all Jews living in the country will formerly have been resident in Russia.

Why, asks Stern, do these Jews choose to emigrate to Germany rather than to Israel or elsewhere? The short answer is: Germany is seen as a land of opportunity; it is part of Central Europe and not as far away or culturally "foreign" as Israel.

"Foreign?" Because to many of the Russian immigrants who sail under the Jewish banner and are therefore not refused admission, Israel, Judaism and Jewish history are unknown, and in addition, a good many of them have intermarried.

The older Jewish community in Germany is uncertain what to do with all the newcomers, of whom only a minority take an interest in the established Jewish organizations. The earlier residents want to integrate them, but at the same time, are afraid of domination by the newcomers. Still, sooner or later, the former Russians will indeed become the dominant element if they continue to identify as Jews. They are, to a large degree, well educated, have marketable skills, and it will not take them too long to integrate into the German economy – but the degree to which they will be part of Germany's Jews remains to be seen.

Thus, the wheel of history has taken a strange and unpredictable turn. Two generations ago, "Russian" and "German" Jews were terms that did not mix – culturally, religiously or socially. Tomorrow's Jews in Germany will be mostly Russians – if they are Jews at all – and it would take the gift of prophecy to foresee what the Jewish community in Europe's heartland will be like.

Polish director interprets The Dybbuk

By Sheldon Kirshner

The adaptation of The Dybbuk by Poland's Teatr Wierszalin would have intrigued the playwright, S. Ansky, had he lived long enough to see it.

Considered one of the jewels in the crown of Yiddish theatre, The Dybbuk was written in 1897. Infused with Jewish folk tales and legends, the haunting play unfolds against the backdrop of two doomed lovers. When their marriage is thwarted, the aspiring groom dies of heartbreak and his soul becomes a dybbuk, a demon which invades the living body of the bride.

As interpreted by the Bialystok-based Teatr Wiersazlin, The Dybbuk is true to Ansky's mystical vision, being full of sound and fury signifying torment. The visually stunning and powerfully acted version, presented by director Piotr Tomaszuk at the Ashkenaz Festival of New Jewish Culture in Toronto late last month, breaks new ground, as Ansky probably would have recognized. It is delivered in English, with a sprinkling of Yiddish and Hebrew. The actors are Polish Catholics. There is fleeting nudity. In short, it blends the old with the new.

Tomaszuk, a 36-year-old award-winning director, was attracted to The Dybbuk because he views it as a gateway to Jewish culture, which has interested him for more than 10 years.

Born in Bialystok, an eastern Polish city whose Jewish population was decimated in Treblinka and Majdanek, Tomaszuk was raised in a Catholic home, though he suspects that his great-grandmother was a Ukrainian Jew.

Since Bialystok was all but bereft of Jews when he was a youth, Tomaszuk's first encounter with Jewish culture did not occur until he was a student at the Zelwerowicz State Theatre Academy in Warsaw. Several of his professors there were well acquainted with the subject and were his guides to the lost world of Polish Jewry.

Inspired by their enthusiasm, he visited the ruins of Jewish cemeteries and synagogues around Bialystok, which was half-Jewish on the eve of the Holocaust, and made a special trip to Prague to see its famous Jewish sites.

As he immersed himself in Jewish history and folklore, Tomaszuk – who founded the Teatr Wierszalin in 1991 – discovered that Polish culture, particularly in the eastern part of the country, had been affected by Jewish influences. "The spirit of it is in our blood, you understand," he told me.

So, of course, Tomaszuk jumped at the chance to do The Dybbuk. His touring company has staged Ansky's classic throughout Poland and the response has been encouraging. "We have been warmly received," said Tomaszuk. In the main, his audiences usually consist of young people.

To critical acclaim, Teatr Wierszalin has performed The Dybbuk at the Edinburgh Fringe Festival. After Toronto, Tomaszuk and his director, Michael Griggs, took it to Chicago. From there, Teatr Wierszalin returns to Poland before embarking on a tour of Holland and Germany.

Tomaszuk believes that Jewish culture is enjoying something of a renaissance in Poland, if only on a superficial nostalgic level. Yet anti-Semitism persists, fed by xenophobia and deep-seated myths about Jews, he acknowledged.

Anti-Semitism exists on both the grassroots and political levels. Tomaszuk has heard shoppers in stores make disparaging comments about Jews and money. And during the presidential election campaign following the collapse of Communism in 1989, the leading candidate cast aspersions on the supposed Jewish origins of his opponent.

It's a sad and disturbing commentary on Poland, but it is partially offset by Poles such as Tomaszuk, who try to preserve Jewish culture through the medium of The Dybbuk.

Kosinski probed limits of the human experience

Jerzy Kosinski was an innovative novelist who probed the limits of human experience. When he committed suicide in 1991, the literary world was aghast, though not surprised.

Suicide had been a recurrent motif in his works, and in this respect, his untimely death was like one of those bizarre psychodramas which informed his novels.

Kosinski, author of The Painted Bird and Steps, was a complicated personality who struggled with his identity and with his writing, James Park Sloan suggests in his splendid biography, Jerzy Kosinski (Penguin Books, $19.99).

A Polish Jew who masqueraded as a Polish Catholic before his reconciliation with his true self, Kosinski was a talented writer whose reliance on editorial assistants prompted charges of plagiarism.

Born in Lodz in 1933, he was the scion of a fairly assimilated family which fudged its Jewishness to survive the Holocaust. Kosinski's identity problems stemmed from this period.

He studied history, political science and sociology in Lodz, and in 1957, he went to the United States to continue his postgraduate studies at Columbia University. Despite a Ford Foundation Fellowship, he took odd jobs as a chauffeur, truck driver, car parker and paint scraper. Within eight months of his arrival in New York City, he managed to produce The Future Is Ours, Comrade, a scathing indictment of the Soviet Union and Communism, under the pseudonym of Joseph Novak.

Sloan is astonished by this feat of authorship, given Kosinski's imperfect command of English. The question would arise again, even after he had achieved fame as a writer and a celebrity. As Sloan puts it: "...Kosinski had to protect a terrible secret: He could not write competently in the language in which he was published."

To be more specific, Sloan claims that Kosinski could not have written Steps — which won the National Book Award — without the help of an editor named Peter Skinner. Kosinski, he explains, provided the ideas, while Skinner "contributed much to the craft and attention to detail."

Kosinski's modus operandi was challenged by the Village Voice in 1982, and the critique devastated him. On this issue, Sloan adopts a measured approach. As he observes, Kosinski was not the stylist he was credited with being, but neither was he a fraud. "He was, if nothing else, a great storyteller."

In his early years in America, Kosinski passed as a Catholic, moving easily in Polish emigre circles. Kosinski also deliberately preserved the ambiguity that he might be a Gypsy. But after the publication of Being There and Blind Date in the 1970s, he openly acknowledged his Jewishness, and gradually became recognized as a Jewish writer.

Once that matter was cleared up, Kosinski labored to work out a reconciliation between Jews and Poles. He associated himself with the Oxford Institute for Polish-Jewish Studies and became the president of its American branch.

In 1988, Kosinski visited Poland and his homecoming was a triumph. The Painted Bird, a classic of Holocaust literature, had made him a persona non grata in Poland. But now he was a hero, the politics of the past having been shelved.

With regard to Poland, Kosinski advised Jews to place less emphasis on the Holocaust and to celebrate the thousand years of Jewish accomplishment in Poland. Detractors interpreted his plea as an apologia for Polish anti-Semitism. But the criticism did not affect Kosinski's views of this sensitive matter. He was a non-conformist to the end.

Take time to reflect on life's changes

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ

George Bernard Shaw once remarked that the only intelligent man he knew was his tailor, who would take a new measure of him every time he ordered a new suit, and would not assume that he always remained the same.

There is no doubt we live in an age of change. The marketplace has changed, family structures are constantly changing, we live amidst changing politics, even the weather has changed. In order to survive we have learned to cope with change. We are no longer intimidated by change and we have learned to adapt to an ever changing society.

It is rather amazing that with so much change all about us — so much about ourselves remains the same. As we anticipate the change of the year, as we enter a new year, we stop to ask ourselves what has really changed? What changes are a result of outside influences — beyond my control? What changes have been brought about by my own choice, through my own decision-making?

A friend sometimes says: "I have decided to take my health seriously. I have stopped smoking. I have changed my diet! I have become serious about exercise." We all know someone who has done one or all of the above. But all too often it was because of serious illness or a stern warning from their doctor. Yes, they change, but not by choice, but by chance happenings, which left them little choice.

In renewing the state of our spiritual health we have similar circumstances. Some have gained greater sensitivity towards Jewish identity and Jewish practice — most commendable. But all too often it was because of outside changes in their lives, the death of a loved one, a disability or misfortune. Positive spiritual and religious change could also come from within, when I choose to fill the void with something significant and meaningful such as a step up in practice, exposure or Jewish study. These choices are mine to make and Rosh Hashanah, the change in the year, is my window of opportunity.

It seems so obvious. The challenge appears so simple. I am constantly stymied as to why we wait for change to be imposed from the outside as opposed to opting to do it on our own, at our choosing, at our own timing. What is it that inhibits our ability to really change? What is the real obstacle preventing honest tshuvah? Perhaps the following will give us some food for thought.

A peasant from a small shtetl came to the city for the very first time. He was impressed with the beautiful display of new clothing. He decided that it was time for a change. He bought a new suit. He could hardly wait until he got home so that he could show off his new suit. To his astonishment and embarrassment, now it didn't fit. He complained about this to his close friends, until one pointed out, "Of course it does not fit!" You put on your new suit right over your old clothes. You have to take off the old before you can put on the new."

To effect change something has to give. I must be prepared to give up something so as to gain something else. Yes, old habits are hard to break, but ironically, those old habits are broken so easily in times of adversity and crisis. We hope that the coming year will bring to each of us much good health and good fortune. Let's start by discarding the mundane and the unnecessary so as to make room for a few changes which can add meaning and satisfaction to our lives and our relationships. May we be the master of change and growth in the year 5758.

Centres' openings reflect new dynamism

This week saw two milestones in the Canadian Jewish community: the opening of multi-faceted community complexes in Toronto and Winnipeg. In Toronto, the opening ceremony of the Sephardic Kehilla Centre was attended by more than 2,000 people. Israel's Foreign Minister David Levy flew in for the inaugural ceremony where he addressed the community.

The Kehilla Centre houses the Or Haemet Sephardic School and a sanctuary, and is designed to provide the Sephardic community with a religious, cultural and educational centre. This is a significant achievement for the Canadian Jewish community in general and the Sephardi community in particular. While there are many Sephardi synagogues in Canada, the establishment of Canada's largest Sephardi cultural centre represents an especially proud moment for a vital and culturally-rich community. Canada's Sephardi community is — much like Canada — a mosaic of cultures and encompasses Jews of varying religious, social and ethnic backgrounds from such places as Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Yemen, Iraq, Iran, Bulgaria, Egypt and a host of other countries. Each of these distinct communities brings with it its own distinct history, customs and rituals. It is this distinctiveness of the Sephardi tradition which will be the focus of the Or Haemet School. Thus the presence of a Sephardi educational institution is an important addition to a city already rich with Jewish educational facilities.

In western Canada, the new Asper Jewish Community Campus in Winnipeg which celebrated its official opening Sept. 7 (which I had the pleasure of attending), houses a school (the Gray Academy of Education); a YMHA community centre (named the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre); and other community offices and facilities. Most impressive is the new Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada and Holocaust Education Centre. Plans for some exciting art exhibits are already underway as the community prepares to join in the celebrations of Israel's 50th anniversary.

The opening of this new and reinvigorated centre is a testimony to the dynamism of the Winnipeg Jewish community which historically has contributed significantly to the strength of the Canadian Jewish community as well as the Canadian presence in Israel.

The establishment of these two centres reflects a new dynamism which seems to be emerging on the Canadian Jewish scene. The enthusiastic response of Canadian Jews to these and other institutions, to events like Ashkenaz (the Festival of Yiddish Culture which enjoyed a successful second year in Toronto this summer), and the numerous Jewish film festivals across the country is all evidence of the vigor of our shared culture. As an Israeli, I take pleasure in participating in these cultural events, and in seeing the continued connection between Israel and the Diaspora. The presence of Foreign Minister David Levy at the opening in Toronto and my own participation at the opening in Winnipeg are, I hope, reflections of a reciprocal commitment between Israeli and Diaspora Jewry.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

The Puttermesser Papers*, by Cynthia Ozick (Random House, $32).

The five beautifully crafted stories that make up this book comprise the biography of a remarkable character.

Ruth Puttermesser (butter-knife) is a worldly, formidably intelligent realist who is also an ever-hopeful romantic. Ozick sympathetically portrays her in a series of fantasy roles or incarnations: youthful attorney for the city of New York's Department of Receipts and Disbursements; mayor of the City of New York through the help of Xanthippe, the erotic female golem (Frankenstein-like figure) she creates; in love at 50 with a young painter whom she introduces to the works of George Eliot – viewing herself as the 19th-century novelist and seeing him as George Lewes, her paramour; sponsor of the immigration to the United States of an overbearing and unappreciative Russian cousin; and finally, as a resident of paradise after she has been murdered.

Each segment of Puttermesser's life affords Ozick the opportunity to elaborate on a variety of themes. What emerges is an amalgam of truth and illusion, reality and fantasy, hope and disappointment – all of it successfully sustained by her high humor, impressive learning and gift for language.

These loosely connected stories meant to be slowly savored are filled with good things by a gifted and wise author.

The Project*, by Zev Chafets (Warner Books, $29.95)

The first Jewish president of the United States turns out to be Dewey Goldberg, a Democrat from the State of Michigan. He attains this exalted office when the incumbent president and vice-president are killed in a tragic boating accident.

After 11 months in the Oval Office, the well-meaning, inexperienced, cautious, canny, former speaker of the House of Representatives is confronted with an upcoming election.

In order to win, he needs the solid backing of his fellow Jews – especially in key states. But to his surprise and dismay, he discovers that he is being undermined by the prime minister of Israel who, inexplicably, is supporting his opponent, an ultra-conservative apocalypse-minded fundamentalist Christian.

Goldberg sends Charlie Walker, his advisor and confidant and a prize winning journalist, to Tel Aviv to investigate. Walker learns a great deal about the elusive Barzel: bachelor, one-time Nazi hunter, crafty politician and wealthy entrepreneur.

Fortunately, Walker uncovers an astonishing dark secret out of Barzel's past that brings Goldberg and the prime minister together for a pragmatic and satisfactory deal. The danger has been averted; Goldberg's victory is assured.

The Project is unfailingly entertaining, an ideal choice for summer reading.

Kotel Kam keeps an eye on Jerusalem's Western Wall

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, I pointed out the best starting points for finding links to the thousands of Jewish and Israeli stops on the Jewish Highway. Today, I continue my (very subjective) look at some of the very best sites.

Although it is just over a year old, Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.jer1.co.il] has distinguished itself as one of the best Jewish sites on the Internet. This massive site has a wealth of information about news, politics, religion and just about any other issue affecting Jews. Plus, they are always looking for novel ways to use new technologies.

Can't attend your cousin's bar mitzvah at the Kotel? Well, you can virtually be there by checking out The Kotel Kam [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/kotel/kam/index.htm]. You can even send your own note to be placed in the Kotel [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/prayer/]. My one criticism of Virtual Jerusalem is that the home page takes a long time to download.

I like The Jewish Communication Network (JCN) [http://www.jcn18.com] because it is informative, thought-provoking and cheeky. Some recent articles from the New York City-based site include Forum Follies: Arabs and Jews Mix it up Online and Bone of My Bones and Flesh of My Flesh: The Cloning of Sheep and Humans. An added bonus: the folks at JCN also scour the Internet for Cool Jewish Sites [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=549].

Again, there's quite a variety here with recent choices like Welcome to Satmar; Bat Kol: A Feminist House of Study; and the Jewish Jugglers Home Page.

Another important site belongs to Shamash — The Jewish Internet Consortium [http://www.shamash.org/]. Although the graphics on this Brookline, Massachusetts-based Web site may not be as zippy as those found at Virtual Jerusalem or the Jewish Communication Network, Shamash provides a home for the Web sites of many Jewish organizations [http://shamash.org/members.html] and over 150 e-mail lists [http://shamash.org/help/listoflists.html].

Many newspapers on the Internet present only a summary of that day's news online and then charge a fee for further information or for the ability to search back issues. Not so at the Jerusalem Post [http://www.jpost.com] which offers a generous selection of current articles as well as the ability to search the archives. Although the Jerusalem Report [http://www.virtual.co.il/news/news/j_report] does not reprint its entire contents on the Web, it does post some very interesting in-depth articles on a regular basis.

If you prefer to listen to the news rather than read it, then go to Attificia [http://www.artificia.com/]. This is the home of Kol Yisrael broadcasts from Israel in both Hebrew and English. You can register for free for a basic selection of newscasts or you can subscribe for a much larger selection. Also, the folks at Artificia are experimenting with video. Those newscasts are quite jerky but it is still amazing to be able to watch excerpts of Israeli television right on your computer monitor.

A while back, I did a couple of columns on a topic which generated more feedback than any other. Jewish Genealogy is certainly a hot topic and thankfully, there is a site like JewishGen: The Official Home of Jewish Genealogy [http://www.jewishgen.org]. Although JewishGen is extremely detailed and can address the problems encountered by people who have spent years researching their roots, it is still an excellent starting point for others who are just beginning to investigate their family tree.

Since the Jewish Highway is so vast, I can only mention a handful of sites each week from the thousands out there. Do you have a favorite Web site, usenet newsgroup or e-mail list that deserves recognition?

Send me its name, address and why you like it – and I'll credit you for your find in a future column.

Next week, some choice religious sites as we approach the High Holidays.

Princess Diana and the right to privacy

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

The tragic death of Princess Diana, whose car crashed while trying to evade newspaper photographers, shocked the world.

Comparative Law

Her brother, Earl Spencer, blamed her death on tabloid newspapers that pay large sums to publish pictures of celebrities. The tabloids' interest in these pictures is fuelled by public demand. A picture taken of Princess Diana and Dodi Al Fayed kissing boosted the daily circulation of the British newspaper the Mirror by 300,000 copies. Clearly, the general public is very interested in details of Diana's private life. But is this invasion of privacy immoral?

Confidentiality is an important concern in Halachah. The Talmud (Yoma 4b) tells us that everything a person relates to a friend is assumed to be confidential unless he specifically states otherwise. Similarly, there is a ban, enacted by Rabbi Gershom of Mainz (960-1028) on reading another person's mail without their consent (Shiltei Gibborim Shavuot, chapter 5; Be'er HoGolah Yoreh Deah 334).

Talmud forbids peeping Toms

To disrupt another person's privacy is forbidden as well. The Talmud (Bava Batra 2a) considers the ability for someone to look into his neighbor's yard to be a form of injury known as "damage by sight". The concept of "damage by sight" means that it is forbidden to be a peeping Tom, and look at another person during moments of privacy (Ramban, Bava Batra 59a; cf. Even HaAzel Hilchot Shechenim 2:16). Damage by sight is considered a personal injury because of humiliation and loss of privacy it creates. Because of damage by sight, a person can force his neighbor to share in the expenses of a fence between their two properties, so that both parties are ensured of their privacy. (Shulchan Aruch Choshen Mishpat 157:1). Similarly, one may not open a window facing his neighbor's house without his neighbor's permission (Shulchan Aruch 154:3). To snoop around another person's property and photograph them while they are in their bathing suits is a violation of this law.

Publicizing the private lives of other people is forbidden as well.

"Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer among thy people" (Leviticus 19:16) is understood as a prohibition against telling negative gossip about other people. Gossip can cause irreparable damage to someone's reputation. In addition, the Talmud notes (Eruchin 15b) that the retelling of gossip can destroy friendships and cause social disruption.

It is important to note that the prohibition against gossip includes listening to gossip (Pesachim 118a). The obligation to prevent gossip belongs both to the person who speaks gossip and the person who listens to gossip. Readers have a responsibility to buy newspapers that do not engage in frivolous gossip.

This does not mean that newspapers can never report on public figures.

In fact, there are instances where gossip is not only permitted, but even an obligation. It is obligatory to warn someone about her boyfriend's dark past, or to warn someone about a prospective employee's unreliability (Sefer Chofetz Chaim 1:4 and 1:6). Similarly, to report on a politician's private dealings, if it sheds significant light on his character, may be acceptable. This is because knowledge of the politician's character helps voters make an informed decision at re-election time. However, a celebrity's private life, which is of no importance to the public, cannot be reported on, and should not be read about. These rules strike a balance between the needs of the public, which needs to be informed about matters of public concern, and the individual's right to privacy.

Halachah takes personal privacy very seriously. To report on (and read about) the private lives of public figures is unethical, unless these reports are important for the preservation of public welfare. The media's hounding of Princess Diana is a sad example of unethical behavior.

Prutschi takes on new job with Sephardic groups

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Manuel Prutschi, 49, executive director of the Ontario Region, Canadian Jewish Congress, has been named the chief executive of Canada's two major Sephardi organizations, effective Oct. 1.

"It is an exciting opportunity to promote unity in the Jewish community between its Ashkenazi and Sephardic elements," Prutschi told The CJN. He was recruited for the job by Jacques Benquesus, a Toronto businessman and philanthropist, the chief contributor and moving spirit behind the new Sephardic Kehila Centre.

Prutschi will move into an office at the new Sephardic Kehila Centre as executive vice-president of the Sephardic Educational Foundation and of the World Sephardic Educational Centre, Jerusalem. The latter position, Prutschi noted, will entail travel in Latin America, the United States, France Spain, and to Jerusalem.

The Foundation is a private one, headed by Benquesus, who, according to Prutschi has three goals in life, "love of God, love of Torah and love of the Jewish people," to complement his desire to build a vibrant, active Sephardic community.

"The Sephardic community is greatly underestimated in Canada and elsewhere and it has come to the point where it is asking for its rightful place," said Prutschi.

The largely post-World War II Sephardic population has grown to 30,000 in Montreal and 15,000 in Toronto, and world-wide is now 3½ million, or 25 per cent of the total Jewish population of approximately 13 million. Some demographers even estimate that the number of Sephardi Jews in Israel is larger than the Ashkenazi, although the question is unresolved in light of the massive aliyah from the former Soviet Union over the last decade, most of whom are Ashkenazi.

Manuel Prutschi

Prutschi, an Ashkenazi born in Ecuador, whose mother tongue is Spanish, sees his new posting as a means of bringing Ashkenazi and Sephardi together.

"We must educate and sensitize the Ashkenazi community about the Sephardic one and vice versa," he said.In a way his new job is like coming home because he studied the Spanish and French Jewish communities at university.

After 13 years in the employ of the Canadian Jewish Congress, five of them in the top job in Ontario, Prutschi leaves his post with the feeling he has accomplished what he set out to do.

Prutschi came to Montreal from Ecuador as a teenager, attended high school and McGill University there as an undergraduate and completed a master's degree in Sephardic history at University of Western Ontario. He had also completed all his necessary academic work for a doctorate degree in the same subject except for his dissertation.

His wife, Sara, was born in Israel and raised in Colombia, and they have two children, Edward, 23, and Tamara, 18, both attending university.

A new Caplan in Oriole

TORONTO — Queen's Park will have another Jewish MPP, as David Caplan easily won last week's provincial byelection in the riding of Oriole.

Caplan, 32, polled 9,954 votes to defeat his Tory opponent Barbara Green, who received 5,163 votes. The NDP's James Kafieh placed a distant third, with 1,700 votes.

His mother, Elinor Caplan, resigned the seat to run successfully in the federal riding of Thornhill.

SUNDAY, SUPER SUNDAY

Hundreds of community members have signed up to raise thousands of dollars on behalf of Jews in need at UJA Federation's largest one-day fundraising event.

On Super Sunday, September 14, from 9:00 a.m. until 9:00 p.m., hundreds of volunteers will contact thousands of community members to enlist their support for the 1998 campaign.

UJA Federation's annual campaign, which reached $35.5 million last year, supports an extensive network of programs and services including financial assistance for the poor, subsidized Jewish education and hot kosher meals for the elderly and the rescue of Jews from unstable regions.

Last year, more than 700 community campaigners raised $2.5 million on Super Sunday and during Super Week, a series of evening telethons which followed.

"It's a wonderful effort by the community for the community," says Vicki Campbell, former Chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign, who is co-chairing the telethon blitz with Jeff Cohen.

Super Sunday kicks off the month long Super September which includes Super Week, with nightly telethons from September 15 – 18 and New Gifts Sunday, September 28.

To encourage community members to pitch in during Super September, UJA Federation has introduced its own Frequent Flyer Program. Volunteers can collect points for each telethon they attend, making them eligible to enter a draw in which they could win free seats on UJA Federation missions, including the Washington Fly-In, the Ottawa Fly-In and even Mission '98 - Israel at 50.

Family members are welcome to help out. "It's a great way for the entire family to get involved with the community and for newcomers to get a taste of what UJA Federation is all about," explains Jeff Cohen, who plans to bring wife Laurie and their two children.

If you're interested in being a Super Hero on behalf of the community and would like to sign up for one of four shifts on Super Sunday or during Super Week, please call Silvia Astrug at (416) 635-2883 ext. 115.

UJA Federation's Campaign Matchmakers

Michael Daren and Lionel Robins have no qualms about using personal connections to help raise funds for UJA Federation. In fact, they believe that finding the right match between campaigner and contributor can often make all the difference.

The two veteran volunteers are heading UJA Federation's King David's Circle, a division that encourages and recognizes leadership within the community, as well as high levels of commitment to the campaign.

Michael Daren

Lionel Robins

Last year, under the chairmanship of Leo Goldhar, UJA Federation's current Campaign Chairman, and several leading campaign supporters, $450,000 was raised among King David's Circle members.

But this year, the team of Daren, who is a partner in the accounting firm of Daren, Martenfeld, Carr, Testa and Company, and Robins, Managing Director of Cedarpoint Investments, is focusing on reaching those who have never contributed to the campaign before, or have stopped doing so.

"There are potential donors out there who represent millions of dollars," estimates Robins, who is convinced it is simply a matter of providing them with the right information about UJA Federation's vital role in the community.

"We must take the time to meet with these people, one on one, and answer their concerns or questions," emphasizes Daren. "It's really an exercise in education and enlightenment."

"It's also about getting the right person to make the contact," says Robins. "That's why we rely heavily on consultations with some of our most experienced donors."

"The value of getting these people back," adds Robins, "is more than their annual gift. It's keeping them on board for many years to come."

Jews for Judaism fights back

The head of Toronto's only counter-missionary group, Jews for Judaism, hopes to hold a special town hall meeting to brief community members about the tactics of Jews for Jesus. Julius Ciss wants the gathering to be held before the High Holidays.

Ciss believes educating community members is the only way to ward off the threat posed by the presence of a new messianic synagogue in Thornhill.

The City of David Synagogue, located in a shopping plaza at the corner of Bathurst and Steeles, is one of six messianic congregations in the Metro Toronto Area attempting to convert Jews to Christianity.

Ciss, Executive Director of Jews for Judaism, which received seed money from UJA Federation when it began its activities in 1989, called the opening of the congregation, located in Canada's fastest growing Jewish community, the most "provocative" move made by the group in recent years.

Jews for Judaism and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, have received hundreds of calls from concerned Jews living in the area and have written letters of complaint to the plaza's property managers.

Rabbi Glenn Black of NCSY, a Jewish youth organization located in the same plaza as the City of David congregation, was deeply distressed recently when City of David leaflets were passed out to young members of his group as they prepared to leave from the plaza parking lot for a weekend retreat.

"We have tons of kids hanging out here all the time," he says, "and that frightens me."

In addition to producing published materials, Ciss also plans to offer community members who might be lured into the City of David's free High Holiday services, alternatives for worship within the Jewish community.

"Our best weapon against these missionaries is public education," insists Ciss.

RECORD GIFT FOR UJA FEDERATION LEGACY CAMPAIGN

UJA Federation has received an unprecedented donation of stocks.

Allan Silber, Edward Sonshine and Morris Perlis, the Chairman and CEO, Vice-Chairman, and President of Counsel Corporation, collectively donated $10 million in publicly traded stock toward UJA Federation's Legacy Campaign, which is seeking to raise $150 million in endowments and capital contributions.

Last February, the federal budget offered financial incentives for contributors to donate stocks to organizations such as UJA Federation. "We hope that others will take advantage of this unique opportunity given to us by the federal government," said Sonshine. "The donation permits us to set up a permanent fund and to ensure better returns," he added. "It also allows our children to get involved and give back to the community."

All three men grew up in environments that instilled in them a responsibility to help Jews in need anywhere in the world. "The importance of Jewish heritage and continuity is integral to the philosophy of our lives," Silber stressed.

"Because of our common philosophies, the sense of belonging to a vibrant, thriving Jewish community is something that has always been very important to us," observed Perlis.

"Rarely does any one person have the opportunity to be in the position we have been blessed with," claimed Silber. "Collectively, we have never felt as good as we do today in being able to provide this kind of gift to Toronto's Jewish community."

Mission '98 excitement mounts

Nearly 300 people were ready for takeoff last week even though Israel 50-Mission '98 is still five months away.

Many of those already registered for UJA Federation's upcoming trip to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary, and would-be participants, attended Imagine a Mission - a promotional night for the mega-mission. The evening was sponsored by UJA Federation, United Israel Appeal of Canada (UIA), the Israel Government Tourist Office, El Al Israel Airlines, Unitours and Aufgang Travel, with T-shirts from Eilat's Princess Hotel and snacks from Billy Bee Honey. UJA Federation and UIA expect 1,500 Canadians to take the tour. Last year, Mission '96, coinciding with Jerusalem's 3000th birthday, attracted 1,200 Canadians, making it the largest mission to Israel in Canadian history.

Israel 50-Mission '98 Chair Sandra Brown noted the number of previous participants who have already registered for next year's journey. "The fact that we have so many repeaters indicates something about the missions we take," she said.

UJA Federation missions, according to Brown, are the only way in which she travels to Israel. "I no longer feel like a visitor in Israel," she admitted. "I feel like we're part of a family."

Mission participant Cheryl Jackson brought her niece Carly to check out the action.

Mission '96 member Brenda Kamen, who is returning next year, said the super-tour "left a lasting impression on us."

Estelle Daniels, another Mission '96 participant made a commitment to the 1998 trip as soon as she returned from Israel last year.

Israel's Consul General Jehudi Kinar claimed that Mission '96 even opened his eyes to scenery he had never seen and people he had never met. "For those who do not join us, you will have to wait another 50 years," he jokingly warned.

UIA of Canada Executive Vice President Steve Ain promised an itinerary concentrating on sites that contributed to Israel's creation. "We will visit Latrun, now the museum of the armored corps," he said. "We will also see a museum dedicated to the armaments of 1948 - a remarkable tribute to the heroism of Israel's fighters."

Ain described Israel 50-Mission '98 as a trip combining the "benefits of a large group and individual buses with their own itineraries and identities."

For UJA Federation's Director of Continuity, Susan Jackson, Israel 50-Mission '98 is a link to Jewish roots. "We will discover the stories of every single stone in the country and, guess what, they're our stones."

Israel-50 Mission '98 will run from February 23-March 4, 1998 at an all inclusive price of $2,498, with a minimum campaign gift of $250 per person for each of the next two years.

For more information, call the Mission '98 Hotline at (416) 631-5698.

Detailed Information on Synagogue seating for the High Holidays is now available on UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Web Site: www.feduja.org

UJA Washington Fly-in to visit Jordanian Embassy

For the first time ever, participants on UJA Federation's popular one day mission to Washington, D.C. will be welcomed into the Jordanian Embassy.

The special invitation came just as the itinerary for UJA Federation's Washington Fly-In, September 25, which includes a visit to the world renowned Holocaust Museum, was being finalized.

The Embassy visit will include briefings by top Jordanian diplomats.

Other highlights of the mission include meetings with Gregg Rickman, Project Director for the United States Banking Committee's inquiry into the Swiss banking affair and Steve Roberts, syndicated columnist and former Washington Bureau Chief for the Washington Post.

The price of the mission is $525 with a minimum $1,000 campaign contribution. For more information call Marc Bookbinder at (416) 631-5703.

BJE says goodbye to respected community leader...

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After 27 years at the helm of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) of Metropolitan Toronto as its executive director, Rabbi Irwin Witty, the charismatic community leader has officially stepped down. His resignation took effect on June 30.

Rabbi Witty is considered to have been one of the architects of the greater Toronto Jewish educational system, which is widely recognized as one of the strongest and most diverse in the Diaspora.

Along with his position at the BJE, Rabbi Witty was dean and lecturer at the Toronto Jewish Teachers' Seminary (Midrasha L'Morim). He has also been actively involved in York University's program in Jewish Teacher-Training Education and for 17 years, was an adjunct lecturer at York.

Before joining the BJE, Rabbi Witty was principal of Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg, where he was also the director of Maimonides College.

He accepted the position with the BJE in 1968 following a speaking engagement at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, where he sufficiently impressed the local leadership that the offer to relocate to Toronto was soon forthcoming.

As part of his formal education, Rabbi Witty studied rabbinics at the Mirrer Yeshivah in Brooklyn, earned a master's degree in history at Columbia University and received his smichah at Yeshiva University.

During his almost three-decade tenure at the BJE, the day school population here grew from 3,200 students to more than 10,000, and the number of programs increased from 10 elementary and high schools to 27 in 35 locations, with several more in formation.

Rabbi Witty believes in Jewish education without regard to ideology, without concern for internecine differences that may exist.

"Our greatest enemy is Jewish ignorance," he told The CJN. "I believe firmly in what our sages taught – that study brings action, Jewish learning leads to the fulfilment of mitzvot." He adds that Jewish continuity is dependent more on a wide base of learned laity and professionals than on an undefined and unarticulated commitment to a Jewish future."

To encourage parents to seek Jewish education for their children, Rabbi Witty frequently speaks to audiences at private meetings, synagogues and social gatherings.

One of his major goals has been to upgrade the level Jewish education. "If you offer quality education, you will find buyers." To accomplish this he has spearheaded teacher training programs, seminars and services, and consultations to assist teachers.

Rabbi Irwin Witty

Teacher training program has benefitted community

He says the Jewish teacher training program has been of great benefit to the community. "It has attracted some of our finest young men and women who are graduates of our local Jewish educational institutions and it has been an exciting adventure for all those involved in it. It has been a source of tremendous personal fulfilment for me."

He says that although he has had moments of frustration and aggravation, "in the main, it has been a great ride. I've been blessed in the work I've chosen to do."

He recently accepted a position as director of The Coalition of Jewish Learning in Milwaukee, Wis., an arm of the federation that brings together Milwaukee's central educational agency. He explains that the newly established coalition is a seminal effort at promoting a community-wide awareness of Jewish education and providing the services and the means that will lead to cultivating lifelong learning in the community.

Rabbi Witty plans to return to Toronto in a year or two, when he has completed his assignment in Milwaukee.

On Sept. 21, the community will express its gratitude to Rabbi Witty at a tribute dinner at the Inn on the Park, sponsored by UJA Federation and its Board of Jewish Education.

Donald Carr, chair of the tribute dinner, told The CJN, "It was my privilege to serve, a long time ago, on a search committee for a new executive director for the Board of Jewish Education. The choice we made at that time became the embodiment of Jewish education in this city for almost three decades.

"Rabbi Witty has made an indelible mark on Toronto Jewry. He has probably done more for religious equality and Jewish continuity than any other person or group.

"Notwithstanding his own personal particular religious commitment, or perhaps, because of it, he has been the champion of every facet of genuine Jewish education, of whatever stream and at every level, from nursery to university. I hope he will continue to contribute in his very unique way."

For further information and reservations for the tribute dinner, please call the BJE at 416-633-7770.

...Welcomes Unterman as new executive director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What made Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman decide to accept the position of executive director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and leave a similar position as executive director of the Commission on Jewish Education in Hartford, Connecticut? He seems genuinely surprised by the question.

"Toronto has a phenomenal Jewish community," he declares, "and an educational infrastructure second in North America perhaps only to New York."

Now that Rabbi Unterman, a 50-year-old native of New Jersey, is overseeing that Jewish educational system (he took over from Rabbi Irwin Witty in July), his first priority is to familiarize himself in greater depth with Toronto's Jewish educational system. He hopes to visit every Jewish school in the Toronto area — and there are over 70 BJE affiliates, including multiple school branches — within the year.

Before moving here, the rabbi was also director of Hebrew College - Hartford, a Jewish teacher training institute. From 1983 to 1992 he was director and professor of the graduate program in Jewish Studies at Barry University in Miami. A frequent lecturer at scholarly conferences, he authored From Repentance to Redemption, a book on biblical prophecy, in 1987.

Rabbi Unterman is impressed by the relatively high percentage of Toronto students attending Jewish day schools. Here, approximately 60 percent of children who attend Jewish schools are day school students (roughly 10,000 out of almost 17,000), more than twice the average percentage in most American communities, he noted.

UJA Federation, through the BJE, provided over $6.5 million last year to Jewish schools. Most of the money is used to subsidize tuition for families who need a supplement (annual day school tuition ranges from $6,500 to $12,500.) A smaller percentage of the money is allocated to supplementary schools.

The rabbi, who has a PhD in Jewish studies, believes that "an excellent Jewish education" for all Jews translates into "a benefit not only to the individual Jew, that person's family and [his or her] own Jewish community but to the entire city, province and country.

Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman

"I believe completely that to be a good Jew is to be a more ethical human being," he explained.

The purpose of a Jewish education, he said, is to increase one's Jewish identity and personal commitment to Judaism.

Rabbi Unterman, who received private Orthodox smichah in Israel, where he lived for eight years, stressed he was not talking about any particular denomination of Judaism. There are many ways to express one's commitment to Judaism, he noted.

A second goal for Rabbi Unterman is to determine how best the BJE can serve the needs of the Jewish community, not only the school system, he said. Among the services offered by the BJE to its schools are consultation services, professional development programs and co-ordination of joint school projects.

"Perhaps the most important growing field in Jewish education today is family education. We are learning more and more that if one can help create a Jewish home, then parents will make sure the child has the necessary skills to become a committed Jew."

The rabbi, who is married with three school-age children, considers himself fortunate to have been raised in "a Jewish home [with] great dedication to Jewish learning [his parents helped found the day school he attended], the Jewish people and Zionism, and in which I never heard the words Orthodox, Conservative or Reform. A Jew was a Jew was a Jew. It had a great influence on me."

Coincidentally, Rabbi Unterman's father, retired attorney Theodor Herzl Unterman, was born in Toronto. His grandparents lived here briefly in the early part of the century.

Rabbi Unterman's late paternal grandfather, Rabbi Isaac Unterman, an eastern European-born scholar, educator, lawyer, Jewish newspaper publisher/editor and author of some 40 books (three of which he wrote in his early 90s), was also a strong influence on his grandson.

"He worked for the bureau of Jewish education in Miami back in the '50s and '60s," said Rabbi Unterman of his grandfather. "He wrote many books on Judaism and [had] studied with many of the great rabbis of Europe. He and my grandmother were strong Zionists. He had a significant impact on my life in terms of my interest in Judaism."

Temple Sinai gets new rabbi

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new senior rabbi of Temple Sinai, Michael N. Dolgin, 31, deplores the divisions within the Toronto Jewish community over the proposed bill in Israel giving legal status only to Orthodox conversions.

"The word Jew means more to me than the adjectives preceding it," said Rabbi Dolgin, assistant and associate rabbi at the temple for the past five years.

"No one can ignore the difficulties of the past year. I think we should bring the community together, rather than fractionate it."

Raised in the Reform movement, the rabbi, a native of Chicago, said, "It is exciting to lead a congregation that upholds tradition but lives it in the 20th century with eyes open."

It is fortunate, he said, that Temple Sinai, the second largest Reform Temple in Canada, still has a large number of active early and founding members among its 1,700 families. All but two of its former presidents are still living. Murray Perelman is the current president. The congregation is so broadly based that no one group controls its affairs, Rabbi Dolgin said.

His credo, simply expressed, is: "It's not what you say or write, but how you live and what you do. We speak with our actions."

Rabbi Dolgin steps into the shoes of Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, the temple's founding rabbi and communal activist.

Rabbi Michael Dolgin

Installation of the new senior rabbi takes place on Sept. 19, with Rabbi Sheldon Zimmerman, president of Hebrew Union College, a former Torontonian, officiating. It will include the premiere of a musical composition honoring Rabbi Dolgin by composer-in-residence Ben Steinberg, performed by Cantor Thomas Schwartz and Joan Dolgin, the rabbi's wife.

Rabbi Dolgin noted that the temple has strong ties to Israel, which is celebrating its 50th anniversary this year, and to the international Reform movement, in which two of the temple's members, Austin Beutel and Harvey Zimmerman, holding leading posts.

Holding a master's degree in speech communication from Miami University of Ohio, Rabbi Dolgin met his wife Joan on campus and they were married 10 years ago. They spent the first year of his five-year program at Hebrew Union College in Israel.

The Dolgins (his wife holds a master's degree in special education) and their three young children, Andy, 7, Mathew, 4, and Zachary, 8 months, the last two born in Canada, have settled into a house in the Bathurst-Sheppard area.

New principal arrives at Netivot Hatorah

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The newly appointed principal of Netivot Hatorah Day School, a co-educational school that provides a full program of Judaic and general studies, brings with him more than two decades of teaching and administrative experience.

"I am excited about being in Toronto and part of the Netivot family, and hope to contribute to its future growth and success," said Raymond Stern in an interview at the school on Atkinson Avenue in Vaughan.

Born and raised in New York City's Lower East Side, Stern received an undergraduate degree in sociology at Yeshiva University and graduated from Technion, Israel Institute of Technology, in urban and regional planning.

He received a master's degree in educational administration at the University of Southern Maine, and a doctorate in educational administration from Yeshiva University.

Speaking of his move to Toronto, he says, "I wasn't looking for a position — I was looking for a special school that stresses excellence in general education, depth of Torah studies, and a school that recognizes the importance of Israel — Zionoot."

He adds that "with some 500 students...it is a unique school which meets the needs of the centrist Orthodox community which identifies with Israel, Halachah, and wants to achieve the best general education possible."

He says he's delighted that board members are interested in seeing the school expand, and that parents express enthusiasm for what the school stands for, and are ready to help in all areas.

Stern is married to Barbara Stern, a Jewish history teacher at the junior high school level. The Sterns have four children studying in New York, Israel, Chicago and Milwaukee.

YOUR LAST CHANCE AT LUXURY LIVING!

WHILE THE CITY OF TORONTO IS EXPERIENCING AN UPSWING IN REAL ESTATE SALES, ONE AREA IN PARTICULAR, THE NEIGHBOURHOOD SURROUNDING BATHURST AND LAWRENCE, HAS REMAINED ONE OF THE CITY'S BEST KEPT REAL ESTATE SECRETS...UNTIL NOW.

"Nobody can tell what the future will bring," admits Alan Menkes, President of Menkes Developments, "but we've been building in this neighbourhood for some time and there's no denying that up until now, this area was definitely undervalued."

Prices Have Definitely Started To Go Up. Encore Will Never Again Be This Affordable

"This is a neighbourhood in active transition," continues Mark Cohen, V.P. of Marketing. "Prices have already started to climb, so time is of the essence. Those with the foresight to be at the head of the line will benefit by reaping the largest rewards."

For those wishing to get in on the ground floor, Menkes is pleased to introduce a special Head-of-the-Line Preview of their newest residential undertaking coming soon to the corner of Bathurst and Lawrence.

"Our goal is to take not only condominium design, but the entire ownership experience, to the next level," says Alan Menkes.

For Menkes this next level was reached by listening to, and acting on what buyers said they'd like to see in a condominium residence.

"We have created a spectacular condominium residence with the features and amenities that will complement our buyers' lifestyles, not restrict them. Furthermore, we're going to make sure that those who appreciate the potential of this neighbourhood and who have the foresight to make a move now, are given first opportunity."

Those With The Foresight To Be At The Head Of The Line Will Reap The Largest Rewards

A full range of feature-packed designs are available with suites ranging from 900 to an impressive 2,100 sq. ft.

To ensure security and peace-of-mind, there is a formal lobby with 24 hour concierge.

For fitness, fun and leisure, Menkes has created a stunning spa area complete with pool, whirlpool, sauna and a card/party room. Plus, there is also a technology/communications/business centre.

And because family ties will always remain important, Encore has a private dining room that's perfect for celebrating those special occasions with relatives and friends.

"There is a new generation of homebuyers moving to the area ... the excitement is building, " says Mark Cohen. "Change is everywhere, and it's change for the better. Menkes is proud to be a part of it."

A Limited Opportunity To Choose From The Best Selection Of Suites, Floors And Views At Early Bird Prices

Lebanon security zone seen as essential

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Barring a political settlement with Syria and Lebanon, Israel has no choice but to maintain its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon indefinitely, says Uri Lubrani, Israel's coordinator of Lebanese affairs for the past 14 years.

Israel cannot impose a military solution in Lebanon, said Lubrani in an interview conducted before last week's abortive Israeli raid into Lebanon which claimed the lives of 12 commandos. But Israel has the ability to contain Hezbollah so that Israelis in the Galilee can lead reasonably normal lives, he added.

Lubrani, here to deliver briefings about the current situation in the Middle East for the UJA Federation, believes that Israel has two options: "We can clear out of Lebanon unilaterally, or we can stick to our guns and do the best we can and deal with terrorist groups while they're not quite on our northern border."

The vast majority of Israelis favor the first option, noted Lubrani, Israel's former ambassador to Iran, Ethiopia and Uganda.

Lubrani, who reports directly to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, claimed that a unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon would not be in Israel's interests.

If Israel withdrew without a prior agreement with Syria and Lebanon, Hezbollah would attack Israel. Under these circumstances, Israel would have no alternative but to launch a "more elaborate" offensive against Hezbollah's bases, Lubrani said. This, in turn, would affect the overall Mideast peace process.

Lubrani, who has advised five Israeli prime ministers from Menachem Begin onward on Lebanese affairs, opposes the enlargement of Israel's security enclave, formed in the wake of the 1982 Lebanon War.

"It would not serve any purpose. It would increase the (Lebanese) population – for which we would be responsible – and would motivate and enhance Hezbollah's capability to hit at us. We would have longer lines of communication to take care of and we would have to introduce more troops, both major mistakes."

Lubrani asserted that Israel should avoid "at all costs" undertaking a massive incursion into Lebanon. "It won't achieve anything."

Responding to terrorist attacks and Katyusha rockets, Israel has carried out numerous raids, two invasions and several major bombardments of Lebanon since the late 1960s.

Lubrani said that Israel is paying a heavy toll to defend its northern border. On average, 23 to 25 soldiers have fallen in Lebanon each year since the end of the 1982 war. "This has to be regarded as the price to keep a whole area of Israel secure." In addition, since the Lebanon War, six civilians in northern Israel have been killed by Hezbollah Katyushas.

Lubrani acknowledged that Hezbollah's military capabilities are "constantly getting better."

He confirmed that Iran has supplied Hezbollah with long-range rockets capable of striking Haifa and warned Hezbollah to desist from targeting Haifa. "It would be very serious. It would force us to use methods and actions we have refrained from using until now." Lubrani declined to elaborate.

According to Lubrani, Hezbollah is financed, trained, armed and guided by the Islamic fundamentalist government in Iran. "It's an extension of Iran's foreign policy. Hezbollah has no will of its own; it follows Iranian dictates."

He said he saw no chance of a rapprochement between Israel and Iran while "the present regime is in place."

Turning to Syria's role, Lubrani said that Damascus "lets Hezbollah do its work with impunity." Syria, he declared, "can stop Hezbollah's activities at will." The Lebanese government is "totally controlled" by Syria, Lubrani said. "I mean it. They cannot take any decision without first referring to someone in Damascus."

He said that Netanyahu's 1996 Lebanon First proposal is still on the table, even though Syria and Lebanon rejected it.

Under its terms, Israel would vacate southern Lebanon if the following conditions were met: all hostilities would cease, Hezbollah would be disarmed and Israel's South Lebanese allies, principally the South Lebanon Army, would be neither penalized nor harassed.

Praising the Israeli-trained South Lebanon Army, Lubrani said it has performed effectively and saved Israel the need to augment its forces in southern Lebanon.

Lubrani said that United Nations Resolution 425, passed in the wake of Israel's first invasion of Lebanon in 1978, cannot be fully implemented unless Israel and Syria reach a global accord covering Lebanon and the Golan Heights. Resolution 425, among other things, calls for an Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon.

Lubrani warned Damascus that its support of Hezbollah imperilled future bilateral talks between Israel and Syria. These negotiations have been suspended since February 1996.

"I can't see any Israeli-Syrian negotiations proceeding with a chance of success while terrorist activity continues. We'll have to find a formula by which (Hezbollah's) military activities will cease, even temporarily, for negotiations to begin. This leads us to Lebanon First.

"It's possible for Israel and Syria to sign a peace treaty. But it can't be superimposed by one side or the other or be the result of Syrian pressure on us in Lebanon.

"I would like to think that (Syria) wants to make peace, but the taste of the pudding will be in the eating."

Israel, Lubrani said, has "very meaningful" security interests on the Golan.

Survivor captures wartime horror in his poetry

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

After a lifetime of memories, North York resident Stanley Hochman recently returned to Poland, his first visit to the land of his birth in more than 50 years.

A survivor of the German war against the Jews, Hochman revisited his native shtetl, Dembrin, where he had been incarcerated in a Nazi labor camp. He also visited Warsaw, Krakow and Auschwitz and other former Nazi death and labor camps. His response to the killing factories was exactly the same as the first time he saw them during wartime: he wrote a poem.

Feature

Hochman first began writing poetry as a youth, after he was rounded up and incarcerated along with many other local Jews in the labor camp in Dembrin. "I started writing poetry from behind barbed wire," he said.

"My father was a butler to a German officer, and when I had finished my work loading bombs, I would go to where he was and I would write."

He and other prisoners were later transported to Buchenwald in cattle cars and Hochman lost his few remaining possessions. After he was liberated in 1945, he spent more than three months recuperating from severe emaciation. Then he rewrote his poems from memory.

Returning to his native town was a disappointment, he said, "because I couldn't recognize the place."

However, he was surprised by the warm reception he received from the assistant mayor and others. One resident remembered Hochman's father, and showed Hochman many local sites that he could not have recognized or found on his own.

The editor of the local newspaper, Nasz Demblin, took a particular interest in Hochman's Holocaust poetry and other writings and asked him to translate his poems and a 15-page wartime memoir into Polish so that it could be published in Demblin.

Goaded by Holocaust deniers in recent years, Hochman said he feels a determination to write in increasing detail about the atrocities he experienced. "In the beginning I wanted to forget about it. Now I think it's important to remember everything that happened, no matter how gory.

"I feel compelled to tell what happened again and again. My kids and my grandchildren know, and I keep telling them, because I am convinced that this thing can happen again. Human nature is that way. I keep warning them to be on the alert."

Hochman, who travelled with a group of Jewish war veterans, reached Auschwitz on a wet day: "It rained and rained, almost as though heaven was weeping with us," he recounted. When he returned home he wrote a four-stanza poem, titled Auschwitz:

Heaven suddenly its gate opened wide
As torrent of tears came down from the sky
In tune with our sorrow we just couldn't hide,
It wept all day long, knowing well why.
Those evil barbarians, devilish creation
Swept away our parents, our children too,
The Final Solution reduced our nation
To a tiny shadow, to hardly a few.
We came to Auschwitz to honor the Dead,
The innocent martyrs, by the Nazis slain
Their souls kept screaming, our insides bled
Genocidal all over you could see the stain.
It rained and rained again all day,
Our hearts still aching and bleeding kept,
With Al Mole Rachmim we began to pray,
As heaven with a deluge of tears still wept.
We left for Warsaw, a once-Jewish place,
To look for the parts that teemed with joy,
There hardly you see now a kind Jewish face,
I used to look at, when I was a boy.

Jewish studies centre a tribute to Eisen's commitment

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Syd Eisen's academic expertise is in Victorian intellectual history, the teaching of which has been a source of pleasure for him, he is better known in the Jewish community as the founding director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, an unanticipated focus for his personal and professional interests.

Earlier this year, after more than 30 years at York (the most recent year as a consultant), Eisen – now a university professor emeritus (history and humanities) – was honored on his retirement with a York conference on the relationship between Judaism and modern science.

He retains his affiliation with the university through Vanier College, where he was interviewed in his office down the hall from the Centre for Jewish Studies.

Eisen never actually taught Jewish studies. A one-time dean of York's Faculty of Arts, his importance to the centre resulted from his administrative expertise and Jewish commitment.

His involvement with what would become the Centre for Jewish Studies began when, as a new faculty member in the mid-'60s, he was asked by York's dean to hire Hebrew instructors. "I'm a Jew. Jewish things are my commitment in life," he explained.

Eisen hired Sol Tanenzapf and Michael Brown in what was to become the first step in creating a Jewish studies program. Both professors are still actively involved; Brown is Eisen's successor.

Eisen is "a gifted administrator," Brown said. "Jewish studies is not his field [but he] is vitally interested in every aspect of Jewish life, civilization and community, and the belief that the teaching of Judaism should occupy its rightful place at the university... He's always been encouraging and helpful. He was one of the people who really shaped York University."

Syd Eisen

An alumnus of the University of Toronto, where he earned his BA in Modern History in 1950, Eisen joined York with credentials including a PhD from Johns Hopkins University and a stint as acting assistant dean of the faculty of Arts and Science at The City College of New York.

In 1973, he became dean of York's Faculty of Arts, a position he held for five years. The Centre for Jewish Studies was inaugurated officially eight years ago.

Eschewing the ivory tower mentality, Eisen and his "tremendous group of scholars," all of whom – including Brown, Tanenzapf, Irving Abella and Martin Lockshin – teach within other faculties, took pains to focus on the greater Jewish community.

"We wanted to do things that would raise the level of Jewish feeling in the community itself," said Eisen.

The establishment of the Jewish teacher education program in the late 1970s is the ultimate example of that philosophy. To Eisen's knowledge, there's not another one like it in the Diaspora.

The combined BA/B.Ed. program, affiliated with York's Faculty of Education, accredits teachers for both Jewish and general studies in Jewish day schools, as well as in the public school system.

Although Eisen considers Israel a fundamental aspect of Jewish education and believes that Israeli shlichim teaching in Jewish schools here "were and are a good influence, I would never want to see a situation where there are no Israeli teachers," he's also convinced of the importance of having "home-grown" teachers as role models.

Initially the program attracted only "a trickle" of students, but now there are more applicants than can be accepted.

The thought of turning away students pains Eisen with a concern that is both academic and personal.

The father of four grown children who are alumni of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Eisen has a long history of involvement with both schools as well as other Jewish organizations. He is now chairing the search committee to find a new CHAT headmaster (Rabbi Marvin Pachino is retiring). He is also a member of B'nai Torah Congregation and serves on its education committee. "And I do love it," he adds.

Eisen's own Jewish education, after he immigrated here with his family at age six, included after-school studies at Eitz Chaim and Torat Chaim Yeshiva (run by Rabbi Aaron Price). He is an alumnus of Harbord Collegiate.

Reflecting on the growth of day school education in Toronto in recent years, Eisen said that many people "have turned to the day school to do what the general culture can't do for Jews.

"While I think the home is as necessary [as the school in fostering Jewish identity], schools have been vitally important in some cases in bringing parents back to Jewish life, and I'm not talking [just] about religious schools. I support all of them, every one, without qualification."

Sephardi Centre opens

Community leaders joined dignitaries from all levels of government and an estimated 2,500 people at the event.

In his remarks, Levy expressed the hope that peace was imminent on all fronts.

"We will make peace with Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon," he pledged in his Hebrew address, "but it will not be a peace from weakness."

Peace with Palestinians will be "very difficult, but everything has been difficult for us," he said.

He recalled how hard his own life had been as a young immigrant to Israel from Morocco, and how his hands hurt tilling the hard soil.

"But if you're strong," he said to applause, "in the end, they will accept you."

The festivities began with the escorting of several Torah scrolls from the Beth Sepharad Congregation in an adjacent strip mall, a short jaunt northward on Bathurst Street to the new building. Music, singing and cheering accompanied the procession.

Levy, Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson, and the centre's president, Jacques Benquesus, unveiled the cornerstone.

Rabbi Amram Assayag, chief rabbi of the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, said the centre "will minister to the spiritual needs of all Jews."

Rabbi Refael Abuhatzira of Israel, grandson of the renowned Baba Sali, the late spiritual leader of Moroccan Jewry, brought greetings and officially named the domed synagogue the Abir Yaakov Congregation.

Benquesus praised the building as a dream realized, and was in turn praised by Levy.

The building was constructed in Cordovan and Moorish architectural styles. Abundant archways decorate both the interior and the exterior of the building, which took 18 months to construct. Its foundation was built of Jerusalem stone.

Or Haemet Sephardic School, which began 22 years ago in the basement of a Metro synagogue, will now be able to handle 300 students in 30 classrooms, and will feature a gym, library and labs.

The synagogue's floor is gently sloped toward the Aron Kodesh to symbolize that one should hurry toward Torah, but walk away from it slowly.

Three huge, specially designed chandeliers in the banquet hall are said to contain 250,000 pieces of crystal. Those wanting to have a simchah there will have their choice of five caterers.

The day after the opening of the centre, Levy flew to Ottawa for brief meetings with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

Levy was scheduled to hold a meeting with Toronto Jewish community leaders last Thursday, but flew back to Israel the same day after the most recent suicide bomb blasts in Jerusalem.

MONTRÉAL – Un des plus ambitieux et imposants projets éducatifs et culturels du monde séfarade contemporain vient de voir le jour en Ontario. La dynamique communauté sépharade de Toronto, constituée de quelque 6 000 âmes, a inauguré officiellement, le 2 septembre dernier, le somptueux Centre Sépharade Kéhila.

Cet établissement éducatif et socio-culturel abritera: l'École sépharade Or Haemet; une synagogue; une bibliothèque; les locaux du Beth Din sépharade de l'Ontario; un Mikveh; un Centre communautaire doté d'une piscine, d'une grande salle de fêtes, d'un gymnase, de plusieurs aires de jeux...

"Le Centre Kéhila sera désormais le pilier fondamental de la vie communautaire sépharade de l'Ontario.Cette institution socio-culturelle va grandement contribuer à raffermir l'identité sépharade des membres de notre communauté. L'inauguration de ce grand complexe communautaire est une preuve manifeste de la volonté farouche affichée par les Séfarades de l'Ontario depuis une quarantaine d'années pour préserver et transmettre le merveilleux héritage culturel que nous ont légué nos ancêtres", nous a confié l'un des responsables de ce magnifique projet, M. Maurice Benzacar, président de la Campagne de construction du Centre Sépharade Kéhila.

Ce projet ne se serait jamais concrétisé sans l'implication exemplaire et la grande générosité d'un leader communautaire hors pair, M. Jacques Benquesus. Ce réputé philanthrope a été l'un des principaux initiateurs et parrains de cette exaltante aventure communautaire. Il assumera les fonctions de président de l'École Or Haemet et du nouveau Centre Kéhila.

Fondée en 1975, par quelques membres de la petite communauté sépharade de Toronto, l'École Or Haemet, qui était localisée à ses débuts dans le sous-sol de la Synagogue Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla, est fréquentée actuellement par 300 élèves.

"Or Haemet est une école orthodoxe qui offre des programmes éducatifs, à partir du niveau Garderie jusqu'au Grade 8, axés sur l'enseignement des traditions séfarades", nous a expliqué le directeur de cette institution scolaire, le rabbin Mordechaï Sévy.

Cette personnalité rabbinique d'origine égyptienne, qui a été, de 1989 à 1992, le leader spirituel de la communauté sépharade de Sidney -Australie-, a joué un rôle de premier plan dans la réalisation de ce projet éducatif.

L'École Or Haemet, nous rappelle-t-il, s'est fermement engagée à inculquer à ses élèves les valeurs morales de tolérance, d'ouverture et de sagesse qui ont toujours caractérisé le judaïsme sépharade. "Par ailleurs, ajoute-t-il, notre philosophie d'enseignement prône l'amour de la Terre sacrée d'Eretz Israël et un dévouement sans failles à l'égard de tout le peuple juif".

"La qualité de nos programmes éducatifs attirent aussi des parents ashkénazes soucieux de prodiguer à leurs enfants une excellente éducation juive. Environ dix pour cent de nos élèves sont Ashkénazes", nous a précisé le rabbin Sévy. La direction de cet établissement scolaire espère doubler le nombre de ses étudiants au cours des deux prochaines années.

Pour M. Maurice Benzacar, l'inauguration du Centre Kéhila va revigorer les structures organisationnelles de la communauté sépharade de l'Ontario. "Notre communauté, qui comptait déjà à son actif de nombreuses synagogues, est de mieux en mieux structurée. Il est indéniable que le renforcement de ces structures va nous aider à mieux assurer la pérennité de la culture sépharade en Ontario", nous a-t-il expliqué.

La conception architecturale du bâtiment abritant ce nouveau Centre est des plus saisissantes et originales. Celle-ci reflète fidèlement le prodigieux héritage que nous ont transmis, au fil des siècles, les civilisations sépharades qui ont vécu dans l'Israël biblique, la péninsule ibérique et les contrées méditerranéennes où les Juifs d'Espagne trouvèrent refuge après leur tragique expulsion, en 1492, des Royaumes de Castille et d'Aragon.

La façade de la bâtisse a été construite avec des blocs de pierre apportés de la capitale du peuple d'Israël, Jérusalem.

Some say anti-semitism is silent.

They don't hear hatred calling.

Recently in one city of the former Soviet Union, the parents of Jewish school children were shocked to read an illegal leaflet distributed by an ultra-nationalist organization. It said, "Kikes!!! Clear Out From Our Place!!! Very soon, you will pay for everything you have done!!" Every month, thousands line up at Jewish Agency offices, supported by UJA Federation, to leave hatred behind. It's their first step to new lives in Israel. The power to give them a safer future is in your hands. Rescue from insecurity, danger and distress is at the heart of our sacred responsibility for one people around the world. Please share that responsibility by supporting the UJA Federation Campaign.

JSU continues search for permanent home

Remains open in old location

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A permanent site for the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) at the University of Toronto's downtown campus has not yet been finalized, but progress has been made toward that goal, according to Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, the umbrella agency for the Hillel/JSU and its counterparts at York University, Ryerson Polytechnic University and Seneca College.

Meanwhile, the Hillel/JSU, which serves a Jewish student population estimated at 3,500, is open for business at the same University College location as last year – through the section F door on the north (quadrangle) side of the building, downstairs from Diablo's cafe, which offers kosher bagels and muffins through an arrangement with the Hillel/JSU.

The Hillel/JSU has been using temporary basement premises since late 1995, when they had to leave their long-term home at 604 Spadina Ave. B'nai Brith Canada, which was about to sell the building, provided the space rent-free, even after a formal connection between the two organizations ceased to exist.

The University College premises, about 1,250 square feet, have two offices, a meeting room and a games room. A pool table takes up most of the floor space in the latter room. Participants in minyans are somewhat crowded as they position themselves around the pool table, said Hillel/JSU director Lance Davis.

"It's a great location for the short term," said Davis, "but we will need a bigger space to provide for more of our diverse activities."

The university has offered the Hillel/JSU a centrally located house and other sites have been mentioned, said Kaye.

The house in question is "very dilapidated," Kaye noted, and would need a "substantial" amount of money for renovations.

The hoped-for permanent quarters would be "a centrally located, above-ground space that speaks of Jewish pride," said Kaye. It would have meeting rooms, lounge space and facilities to accommodate a wider variety of activities.

"The proposals are on the table," said Kaye, adding that JCS is working with UJA Federation to secure funding for the project. "We're quite optimistic that we'll open within the year."

Images to print special issue to mark 50 years of Jewish student press

By ALEXANDRA PRASOW
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – As Jewish student press in Toronto celebrates its 50th anniversary this year, Images, Toronto's Jewish student newspaper, is preparing its September edition with excerpts and reprints commemorating the last 50 years of Jewish student discourse.

Along with the 50th anniversary, Images itself is celebrating chai – 18 years in its current incarnation.

A monthly publication, Images provides a forum for issues, opinions and events concerning Jewish student life. The last issue included subjects such as student programming, Nazi war criminals, Middle-Eastern politics, the threat of missionaries and reviews of kosher restaurants.

The September issue of Images plans to have 50 contributors whose voices will span 50 pages – the largest in the history of the paper.

The publication team is seeking advertisers and sponsors to assist this student venture with financial support. Images invites its past editors to write articles about their experiences as well as to provide archival materials. Writers, photographers and research editors are also needed for the newspaper.

Those interested can contact Images at the Jewish Campus Services at (416) 785-1465 or Images' editor-in-chief, Dave Gordon, at (416) 631-8053.

Images is published by Jewish Campus Services with the support of its member organizations in York University, the University of Toronto, Seneca College and Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Hoenlein helps launch Winnipeg CJA campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israel is a major world power and Jews count in the world today.

But that is both a blessing and a curse, says Malcolm Hoenlein.

The executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, Hoenlein brought his message to a relatively small crowd recently at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

He was in Winnipeg to help kick off the 1997 Combined Jewish Appeal Campaign.

Citing numerous examples of large-scale massacres in various regions in recent years, Hoenlein observed that the world has not changed much in the last 50 years. Apathy and indifference still reign supreme, and the "big lie" still works.

The "big lie" has cost millions of Jewish lives over the centuries, he said. Two recent examples involving Israel, he explained, are the idea that American Jews are spying on the United States for Israel, and the Palestinian accusation at the United Nations Human Right Commission last March that Israel is infecting Palestinian children with the HIV virus.

The Palestinian claim "is a modern blood libel," he said. "The accusation sits as part of the UN record. No one in authority at the UN has stepped forward to challenge or refute the lie."

The Har Choma controversy is also based on lies, Hoenlein said. It is a housing project, not a settlement. It is in Jerusalem, not East Jerusalem and it joins two Jewish areas. As well, the land is 70 percent owned by Lithuanian Jews who bought it in 1927. No one has ever lived there.

Former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek designed the project in 1988, according to Hoenlein, and Yitzhak Rabin approved its construction.

"The [UN] security council has not had a single meeting about any of the massacres that have taken place in the world, but a housing project or the opening of a tunnel in Israel is seen as a major international crisis. It shows that the 'big lie' still works where Jews are involved."

Hoenlein also noted the disturbing resurgence of fascism and anti-Semitism in Europe and elsewhere. Right-wing parties are winning seats in elections. There are 70,000 skinheads in western Europe.

Of greater concern is the danger posed worldwide by the growing legions of Muslim fundamentalists.

It "would seem" the West has fallen asleep again after rousing itself to put Iraq in its place. Iraq was diminished rather than defeated, Hoenlein said, and it can rebuild its weapons of destruction.

Of greater danger, he said, is Iran, the "fulcrum" of the fundamentalist movement and a regional super power. The country has recently taken delivery of three Russian nuclear submarines, and thanks to Russian scientists, it has developed missiles with the capacity to hit any target in Israel or Europe, he said.

Islam is also rapidly gaining new adherents in Europe and Africa (Ethiopia is now 45 percent Muslim, for example) and has a secure foothold in North America, he added.

"Canada and the United States are the second largest source of funding for Islamic terrorists worldwide," he said. "There are terrorist cells in more than 40 states. The FBI has hired an additional 2,600 agents to fight Islamic terrorism. There is a trial going on in New York right now that is vital to American and western security. Yet it receives very little press coverage."

On the positive side, Hoenlein noted, for the first time in modern Jewish history, there is no country in the world where Jews are not allowed to leave. Over 800,000 Russian Jews have "come home," he said, and virtually all Jews have left Syria and Ethiopia and Yemen.

Furthermore, tens of millions of people around the world are claiming to be of Jewish descent.

Benjamin Netanyahu, he argued, has lived up to all of Israel's commitments under the Oslo and Hebron Accords. Yasser Arafat has yet to carry out his side of the bargains, Hoenlein claimed.

"You have the right to disagree," Hoenlein told his audience, "but words count. You count. As Israel becomes more economically independent, all Jews become more interdependent. We are one people, one faith and share the same fate. When we stand together, we can create miracles."

Winnipeg CJA '97 co-chair Sam Guralnick called on all members of Winnipeg's Jewish community to stand together. This year's theme is Now More Than Ever, as the CJA team seeks to reach out to new contributors and maximize the donations of existing contributors.

One new approach is an emphasis on "Dollar Divisions" rather than the old "Professional Divisions." Contributors' names will be published in a booklet of honor divided into the different divisions.

As well, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's Wall Fund, which was founded in the late 1980s, is being renamed the WJCC Endowment Fund for Jewish Continuity and will be administered by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. The fund had raised over $1 million for community programs.

The interest from the fund will go to the CJA campaign and new donors and previous donors who gave more than $100 will have their names featured in the Jewish Foundation's annual report.

Enrolment on rise in Jewish schools

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite anger expressed by many north Winnipeg Jewish parents at the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) decision to close Talmud Torah school as of June 30, it would seem most parents have opted to leave their children in the BJE system.

The latest figures show that the total enrolment at the new Gray Academy of Jewish Education, on the newly opened Asper Jewish Community Campus, is about 840, an increase of about 20 students over last year.

Hebrew bilingual programs

The increase comes despite the fact that some north end parents of younger children have moved their 6- and 7-year-olds to the Seven Oaks School Division's Winnipeg Hebrew Bilingual program in north Winnipeg.

"We are pleased with the continued support of north end families," says Jack Solomon, the BJE superintendent of schools.

The Gray Academy is divided into three levels. The Simkin Early Years program – Junior Kindergarten through Grade 4 – has an enrolment this year of about 375. The Grade 5-8 Shore Middle Years School has a registration of 273. The Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate's student numbers are 192.

The success of the new Gray Academy, however, does not seem to be affecting enrolment at the two public school elementary Hebrew bilingual programs. Brock-Corydon in south Winnipeg has about 174 students registered – almost the same number as last year. The north Winnipeg program has a registration of 104 this year – a drop of six from last year.

The difference is that a comparatively large Grade 6 class of 24 graduated last June from the north Winnipeg program and the kindergarten class usually starts off with lower numbers of students. The school should show an increase next year because this year's Grade 6 class has only nine students.

Holocaust conference planned for Alberta

CALGARY — An upcoming Holocaust conference at the University of Alberta (U of A) promises to be a notable international event. World-class scholars will be in attendance, some speaking in Canada for the first time.

The conference and art exhibition — entitled The Holocaust: Art/Politics/Law will be held at the Law Centre of the University of Alberta on Oct. 29 and 30, with the art exhibition presented from Oct. 29 to Nov. 8. All events will be open to the public.

The conference theme is human rights and social justice. In particular the program will address legal, moral, political, cultural and esthetic meanings of the Holocaust and their continuing significance to contemporary social and intellectual life.

Dr. Bernard Schwartz of the university's department of Education has spent the past six months working full time on organizing the conference.

Guest speakers include Raul Hilberg, whose three-volume work is considered to be the definitive statement on the destruction of European Jewry. Bruce Elman, U of A law professor, will deliver the Annual Belzberg Lecture on Hate Propaganda and Legislation. Other speakers include Henry Friedlander of Brooklyn College in New York, Harold Kaplan, formerly of Northwestern University, Michael Kater of York University, Sybil Milton of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington and Richard Weisberg of Yeshiva University. Anne McLennan, the federal minister of justice will open the conference.

The event also features Perpetrators, an exhibition of 42 original prints by American artist Sid Chafetz. The prints represent the "ordinary people" who formulated the laws of the Third Reich, built the armaments, designed and ran the concentration camps, directed the armies and carried out the propaganda programs. The artist will be in attendance at the evening opening reception on Oct. 29 and will present an illustrated lecture the following morning.

There will be a film festival featuring documentaries and feature films on the subject of the Holocaust. These include: Anne Frank Remembered, The Architecture of Doom, Degenerate Art, Europa, Europa, Night and Fog, One Survivor Remembers, Survivors of the Holocaust, Triumph of Will, Voices of Survival, The Wannsee Conference, and We Must Never Forget.

FSU Jews live in a place of sad existence

By STANLEY K. PLOTNICK

In recent times, as all levels of governments have shrunk their transfer payments for local, health, social and educational needs, many individuals have started to question the extra and, in some cases, even the need for Diaspora financial involvement overseas. I too, recognize the tremendous needs at home. But, after returning recently from the former Soviet Union and Israel, I have been re-sensitized to the important issues abroad. Not only are our contributions overseas needed, and very well used, but our continued participation both enhances and strengthens our own Jewish identity. The following is an account of only a small part of what we said and experienced on that trip.

The older faces were distinctively eastern European. The younger, a blend of the old and the "coolness" of western influence. But none of their eyes had a sparkle, none of their lips a ready smile, none of their movements a real purpose. These were the people on the streets of St. Petersburg. This once magnificent city, is now mostly shabby and tired. It is really a place of sad existence, and, St. Petersburg may, in fact, represent the "best" of the former Soviet Union (FSU).

And yet, there are bright spots. My heart was warmed at joining a luncheon of the St. Petersburg "Yiddish Club," which, as expected, was made up of seniors, who once again had the freedom to sing Yiddish songs, talk about the holidays and share some of their previously secret Jewish experiences.

I rejoiced at a Kabalat Shabbat at a St. Petersburg youth centre, at which dozens of young Russian Jewish children were returning to their roots and traditions, and shared with us Havdalah, and Israeli dancing and singing. They talked about their plans to visit Israel, and, some, to even make aliyah. And they talked, with pride, of being Jewish.

I was overwhelmed to learn of, and visit, the children's camps that are run, throughout the FSU, by teams of Israelis and locals, and which, every year, provide nearly 15,000 Jewish children with an incomparable Jewish camping experience — regardless of their ability to pay — the opportunity to play ball and to swim, and to learn of their heritage, of their ties to other Jews around the world, and of their opportunities and potential in Israel. It is incredible how much they can learn in a very short time.

I was deeply touched by the courage of the parents we met, who had sent their children to Israel, even though they were not sure they could follow. They had made a tremendous sacrifice in recognizing that the potential for their children was greatest away from them. I could not help but share their sadness, as they described how lonely they were, and yet how certain they were that they had made the right decision.

I was fascinated to meet Jews of the FSU, of all ages, and to see how they were preparing for their aliyah; how they were learning about Israeli society, about the opportunities and challenges; how they were learning the language, and learning also about the difficulties they might encounter.

And, I was excited as I boarded a flight filled with olim who, with their limited belongings, hidden apprehensions, courage and optimism, were leaving for "hopefully a better life."

I had seen a great deal in St. Petersburg and Azerbaijan, but yet so little. I had met an inspiring courageous team of Israeli field workers who are working throughout the FSU. They are dedicating their lives, their hearts, and their souls, to provide a better life to those Jews who remain in the FSU, and a better opportunity for those who wish to emigrate.

I have never seen a spirit that equalled theirs, and never felt so proud that, in some small way, we helped make possible all that they were doing, and so much of the positive re-awakening that was happening all around us.

I began to realize what an incredible "burden," we the Jews of the world, have placed on our State of Israel, by insisting that she accept the poor, and the old, and the handicapped, without qualification, other than that they be Jewish. And even this qualification is interpreted in the broadest sense when the arriving individuals are in distress. After all, if the demons of the Holocaust could define a Jew as anyone who had a grandparent who was Jewish, then how could Israel, their refuge and sanctuary, be any more restrictive?

How could we insist that one small state absorb an additional 25 percent of its population, in less than a decade, as well as provide for their integration from different backgrounds, cultures, races, and capabilities?

Virtually all these immigrants are poor; 60 percent are over the age of 50 (as compared to 13 percent of Israelis); a disproportionate number are mentally or emotionally or physically challenged; 20 percent are single parents; and 25,000 are children without parents. Imagine the impact of this decision that Israel has made in conjunction with us, the Jewish people throughout the world. Imagine the challenge to the infrastructure and to the social structure of Israeli society. Imagine the cost to Israeli society, both in monetary and social terms. And, remember that in accepting all who immigrate to its shores Israel is fulfilling the mandate jointly sustained by itself and world Jewry.

I have witnessed the many positive results of this incredible immigration. I have seen the massive construction, and the busy shops, and the new city halls and theatres. I am aware of the growth of the economy, and the explosion of exports, and the new Israeli wealthy.

But, I have also seen the many centres for "children at risk;" the new shelters for abused and battered women, the bomb shelters that double as youth drop-in centres, and old age clubs and child care centres, in the poorer neighborhoods. I have visited the absorption centres, and language ulpans, and even the few remnants of the trailer villages. I have seen the poverty of many of the recent immigrants; their frustration, and sadness, at not being able to find dignified work. And, I have seen the growing youth delinquency that has accompanied this miraculous influx of Jews.

I am overwhelmed by how much Israeli society has been able to cope, especially with the continuing peace and security challenges.

But, most of all, I am proud that we, Canadian Jews, are able to be an integral and continuing part of all that is taking place, the reawakening of Jewishness in the hearts, souls and minds, of the Jews of the FSU; the caring for the weak and frail, of our people, in Russia, Azerbaijan, Ukraine, Belarus; the aliyah of Jews at risk; the absorption of the olim into their new Jewish lives in Israel; the fulfilment of our role helping to make Israel a safe, easily accessible refuge for all of our people; and the proper sharing of our responsibility to look after other Jews wherever in the world they may be.

I am very proud of what we have been able to accomplish in the last 49 years and I feel fortunate that we have been an integral part in what has taken place.

We have all gained enormously from the birth, growth and success of Israel, we all stand taller and prouder as Jews, no matter where we live.

And, I hope, that we will continue our active partnership, that we share both the burdens and the blessings of caring for each other, and protecting Israel...our pride, defender, and eternal home and refuge.

Stanley K. Plotnick is the incoming president of FEDERATION CJA in Montreal.

Mohel's clamp seen as better circumcision tool

By MARA DRESNER
Connecticut Jewish Ledger

CONNECTICUT — When it comes to baby's comfort and safety during circumcision, mohels may have the inside track rather than hospitals — not by virtue of divine intervention, but rather, by the choice of the clamp used to perform the procedure.

A new study by Dr. Hema N. DeSilva, director of neonatology at St. Francis Hospital and Medical Centre in Hartford, confirms that the clamp that mohels use — the Mogen — is the better choice. Most hospital circumcisions are performed using the Gomco clamp. DeSilva presented the results of his findings at the recent annual meeting of the Pediatric Academic Societies.

DeSilva, who estimates that he has performed over 10,000 circumcisions during his career, was trained to use both types of clamps.

He prefers the Mogen clamp and estimates he has performed 5,000 circumcisions using it.

He and his St. Francis colleagues decided to study the clamps about two years ago. This is the first study that DeSilva knows of that compared the two clamps. After getting approval from parents, DeSilva randomly selected 48 babies, using the Gomco clamp on some and the Mogen on others. Babies were monitored for heart rate, breathing pattern, oxygen saturation and cry time.

Not only was the Mogen clamp faster, but babies were much more comfortable when the Mogen clamp was used. "The [negative] changes were certainly much greater with the Gomco clamp," DeSilva noted. "Mohels have been using the Mogen clamp for years," he added.

DeSilva believes that one of the reasons that so many hospitals have been using the Gomco clamp is because that's what the physicians were trained on.

Despite the fact that using the Mogen takes less time, DeSilva said that this is not a motivating factor in choosing to use it.

To Your Health

How to be an advocate for your medical care

During a time of major health care reform and dramatic restructuring, today's consumer is becoming increasingly concerned about how to be an informed and active participant in their health care experience. More and more health consumers wonder how to best navigate the medical maze. Mount Sinai Hospital's department of patient relations offers the following suggestions:

When you arrive at the hospital:

Bring a paper and pen to write down your questions for your caregivers (doctors, nurses) as you think of them and ask for answers for these concerns.

Consider keeping a journal if your health care experience is extensive and involves many health care professionals over a prolonged period of time.

Ask caregivers for their names and titles, and write them down.

Ask what tests and procedures are being done and why.

Find out when your doctor visits and have someone with you to listen to the information to ask questions, and to talk with after the team leaves.

Before you sign any consent forms, make sure you read and understand them.

Bring a list of all medications you've been taking at home.

When it's time to go home:

Ask about the normal or abnormal side effects of your procedure, such as how much pain should be expected.

Ask for educational material on your condition, procedure and treatments.

Find out how much you will be able to do when you get home and what you will need help with. Ensure that you, your family and your caregivers make arrangements for help.

Ask about your home care options. Find out exactly what home care arrangements have been made and ask for the contact name and phone number. If something is not covered, make sure you plan for the help you need.

Ask about your expected recovery time. Find out when you can return to work.

If you or your loved ones do not feel you are ready to return home, state your concerns to your caregivers and ask for some time to discuss these concerns in detail.

Ask about follow-up procedures and rehabilitation therapies. Find out what future appointments you will have and with whom. Ask if you should have a follow-up visit scheduled with your physician.

If you need help resolving your concerns or want to give feedback to the hospital, find the hospital's patient representative. The hospital reception can give you this contact.

To Your Health is a regular column prepared by a partnership of Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

IDF stunned by botched Lebanon raid

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A stunned IDF is doing some heavy soul-searching to find out how Hezbollah succeeding in wiping out nearly an entire force of naval commandos during a botched raid in south Lebanon early last Friday that left 11 dead and one missing and presumed killed.

Hezbollah gloated over its victory, showing off mutilated bodies and calling the battle a grave defeat for Israel.

Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak said the IDF is "in pain."

He appointed Maj.-Gen. Gabi Ofir to head an investigation into the failed operation. Navy and air force representatives will also be on the committee, which must examine not only the planning of the attack, but also the possibility of an intelligence leak.

"We will examine everything connected with this operation to learn what is needed to ensure the security of the residents of the north," Shahak said.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said the IDF's "method of operation in Lebanon will come under stringent review," although the basic policy of remaining in Lebanon "as long as the north is endangered will not change."

European Union envoy Miguel Moratinos telephoned cabinet secretary Dan Naveh and Foreign Ministry Director-General Eytan Bentsur Saturday night and passed on a message from Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri that Lebanon is interested in reducing the tension in the region.

What began as a pinpoint operation suddenly exploded into a fierce battle to survive a death trap, when the 16 naval commandos were ambushed as they approached their target just after midnight. They had landed near the sea and were nearing the end of their three-kilometre approach to the village of Ansariya, between Sidon and Tyre, when a Hezbollah-laid bomb blew apart the squad. A rain of gunfire cut down those who were not wounded in the explosion.

Two more bombs were said to have gone off, possibly charges carried on the backs of commandos.

The battle was short, with Hezbollah gunmen being joined by Lebanese Army troops, members of the local group Amal and some civilians. Of the 16 raiders, 10 were killed, including the force commander; four were wounded, one seriously; and one was missing.

The sole unscathed commando radioed for evacuation. A rescue squad immediately set off for the site of the ambush in a helicopter, but only reached it about half an hour later. IAF attack helicopters flew air cover and rocketed terrorist and Lebanese Army positions around the ambush sight. Two Lebanese army soldiers, four Amal, and two Hezbollah fighters were wounded, Lebanese security sources said.

As the CH-53 Yasur helicopter landed with the rescue force, guerrillas in an approaching car opened fire, hitting it but not causing significant damage. IDF troops returned fire, riddling the car and killing at least one passenger, military sources said.

A Lebanese Army statement said civilians took part in the clashes, and that the fighting killed a woman and a young girl and wounded six other civilians.

Intense enemy gunfire

Under intense gunfire, the rescue squad succeeded in loading most of the wounded and dead, but its field doctor, Maj. Dagesh Maher, was killed. The damaged helicopter took off, but made an emergency inspection landing once it crossed the border. It then continued directly to Haifa's Rambam Hospital, where President Ezer Weizman visited the wounded later in the day.

In the chaos, efforts were made to extract all the commandos and all body parts, but not all were found. Third Petty Officer Itamar Ilya is missing and presumed dead. Under instructions from the highest echelons, a small force remained behind to search the area, but to no avail. At 4:30 a.m., just before dawn, the order was given to evacuate.

"From reports in Lebanon we have received, it appears body parts were found," a solemn Shahak told military reporters Friday afternoon.

He said it would have been very complicated for Hezbollah to have known the route of the IDF force, but could not rule it out.

Throughout the battle, Shahak and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai joined Navy Adm. Alex Tal at navy headquarters.

Mordechai said that the purpose of the raid was to hit at Hezbollah deep in Lebanon, and that it was ordered despite the risk. "All the risks were taken into account and it seemed correct to take the action," he told Channel 2.

In Lebanon, one gunman held up the head of a dead commando for photographers, before a Lebanese soldier intervened. At a news conference in Beirut, Hezbollah displayed parts of the dead commandos, along with captured weapons, detonators and swimming flippers.

Hezbollah secretary-general Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah said the group is holding no Israeli prisoners and warned Israeli soldiers not to set foot in Lebanon.

"Any town you decide to come to, you will not only find the alert eyes of guerrillas watching you, but bombs planted in the ground, in the walls and in trees," he said. "What happened was a grave defeat for Israel and a major morale and human loss for Israel's military establishment."

"This is a day of heavy sorrow and redoubled bereavement for the people of Israel," Netanyahu told reporters. "In a vile attack in Jerusalem, we lost the flower of our daughters and sons, and last night in Lebanon, we lost 11 of our best fighters.

"The State of Israel is caught up on two fronts in a tough and bitter struggle against despicable terrorists, whose only desire is to destroy the State of Israel and to murder its citizens."

While officials would not divulge the target of the raid, Lebanese sources said that the objective was the kidnapping of an Amal leader. This could not be confirmed.

Commandos' mission remains a mystery

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Mystery still surrounds the objective of the IDF naval commando unit in last week's abortive mission in Lebanon.

According to reports from Lebanon, the area itself, near Ansariya village, is a populated coastal strip, without any obvious Hezbollah or Amal targets.

The main road leading from the south to the Lebanese capital, Beirut, runs through the area, which contains some of the country's most fertile farming land and is dotted with plantations.

The coastal area is also said to contain some of Lebanon's finest and most frequented fish restaurants, as well as bathing beaches.

It was along a route running through one of the plantations that the elite IDF unit was apparently ambushed by Hezbollah, who first detonated a mine or other explosive device and then opened fire from relatively close range.

The region is a distance from the so-called "front lines" of the security zone and therefore generally quiet. According to the reports, there is a large force of Lebanese Army troops deployed there, keeping tight control over the area.

The Shi'ite villages in the region are primarily affiliated with the Amal movement, although as in other parts of Lebanon in general, and the south in particular, there is a large presence of Hezbollah supporters and activists among the local population.

Amal maintained in statements that the target of the IDF unit was one of its command centres in the Ansariya village area.

Other reports said that the naval commandos had intended to kidnap leading Shi'ite cleric Sheikh Abdel Amir Kabalan, who is affiliated with Amal and is vice-president of the Supreme Shi'ite Council of Lebanon. Kabalan has a home in Ansariya.

Amal leader Nabih Berri said the abortive attack was in retaliation for recent actions by Amal "resistance fighters" in the Wadi Saluki area.

Four Amal gunmen were killed in a clash with Golani Brigade troops in the Wadi Saluki area last week. The Golani soldiers were later caught in a brushfire which claimed the lives of five of them.

Veteran Lebanese observers expressed skepticism over Amal's claims, however, maintaining that Amal retains only a haphazard fighting arm which poses little threat to the IDF or the SLA in the security zone.

Furthermore, they said the claim that the target was Sheikh Kabalan is illogical, given Kabalan's moderate stance and the fact that he made no effort to hide his movements.

Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, for his part, maintained that there were no Hezbollah or Amal targets in the area of the commando operation.

In an apparent contradiction, however, Nasrallah also said Hezbollah planted explosive devices around those areas and units it felt it was necessary to protect. This would indicate that Hezbollah did have something or someone to protect in the area.

On the other hand, Hezbollah may have been playing a disinformation game from the start, to give the impression it had something there to defend, and then set up an ambush in the event the bait was taken.

Amal, according to an eyewitness account from one of its gunmen, only got into the picture when its activists heard the explosions and the sound of shooting.

Similarly, the Lebanese Army was not, apparently, involved from the outset. It reportedly concentrated mainly on firing mortars at the troops on the ground and anti-aircraft guns at IAF helicopters and warplanes, when they came into the picture, after the initial clash.

UN spokesperson Timor Goksel, himself a veteran Lebanese observer who has been with the peacekeeping force in Lebanon virtually since its inception in 1978, was at a loss regarding the IDF's objective in the area.

"This is a densely populated area with a lot of people moving around. The Israelis must have been convinced that there was a very attractive target, whatever it might be, in this area, to sanction and clear what was an extremely high-risk operation," said Goksel.

Mortar kills soldier at post in Lebanon

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH and SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An IDF soldier, Lt. Avraham Bok, 22, was killed by Hezbollah fire at an IDF outpost in south Lebanon early Sunday morning.

His death brings the number of IDF soldiers killed in or en route to Lebanon since the beginning of the year to 103: 73 in February's helicopter collision and 30 in operations.

Bok, the Nahal commander of the Tel Dabshe outpost on the Beaufort Ridge bordering Nabatiya, was killed by a mortar round at about 6 a.m. As the position came under mortar and rocket-propelled grenade fire, Bok was running among his soldiers checking their positions when he apparently took a direct hit.

In response, the IDF artillery shelled the surrounding area for an hour.

Meanwhile, the IDF inquiry into the abortive commando raid – in which 11 naval commandos were killed, one was missing and presumed dead, and four were wounded – issued preliminary findings Sunday. The report said the commandos may have been killed both by Hezbollah explosive devices and gunfire, and by the detonation of explosives they carried.

According to Channel 1, the inquiry is examining a theory that the unit's commander strayed slightly from the route and stepped on a Hezbollah mine, which in turn detonated charges the troops were carrying. The inquiry has not ruled out other possibilities, including that charges carried by the commandos exploded due to a technical failure, which drew Hezbollah fire or that the commandos walked into a Hezbollah ambush.

The most worrying possibility of all is apparently an intelligence leak. In a press conference, Chief of General Staff Maj.-Gen. Amnon Shahak stated that it would have been very complicated for Hezbollah to have known the route of the commandos, but he could not rule it out.

Mordechai visited the family of Third Petty Officer Itamar Ilya, who is missing but presumed dead. At their Arad home, Mordechai assured the family that everything possible is being done to return their son's remains.

Israel has lodged a formal request with the International Red Cross Committee asking for its assistance in retrieving Ilya's body. Committee head Iov Giovanni said Sunday the organization had forwarded a request to the Lebanese authorities and is waiting for a reply.

Hezbollah and its Shiite rival Amal announced they are holding parts of the body of the missing commando, but made it clear they would make use of the body parts to arrange an exchange for Lebanese prisoners being held by Israel and the South Lebanese Army.

• Israel's religious parties threatened a coalition crisis over a proposal to drastically cut the Religious Affairs Ministry budget. Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman's cuts would translate into a $214 million savings. His plans call for the religious ministry to shoulder nearly one-third of his total proposed budget cuts.

• Israel's flower growers shipped an additional five million fresh-cut stems for sale to Britons this week who want to pay their respects to Princess Diana. Israel sells more than 1.5 billion flowers in Europe annually.

Sept. 5

• Israeli media reported that U.S. Secretary of State Madelaine Albright still plans to visit the mideast region, despite yesterday's bombings. Her itinerary will not change, but the content of the visit will, in response to the attack.

Arafat must make a choice: Netanyahu and those yet to be reached. He suggested that all the powers interested in resolving existing conflicts, Russia as well as the United States, should take effective action to prevent the regional balance of power from shifting in Iran's favor.

Netanyahu contended that the Iranians' ultimate objective – arming their projectiles with biological, chemical and nuclear warheads – would pose a threat to the entire world while enhancing Iran's incessant effort to disseminate its extremist ideology.

In discussing the Palestinian track, he made no reference to the construction work at Jerusalem's Har Choma or the reported possibility that Albright may seek a three- to six-month pause in the controversial project. Nor did he seem ready to make any concessions on settlements in conjunction with further redeployment or proceeding to final status talks.

"We have a clear position, which is that we fulfil agreements," Netanyahu said. "The Oslo Accords are quite clear about our commitments and about the Palestinians. They make no mention of settlements – in fact, [Yitzhak] Rabin was very clear about the freedom that Israel maintains to build settlements, even new ones, something we are not doing.

"I think the important thing at first is to establish [the principle] that old commitments are kept before new ones are entertained.

"We fulfilled our side," Netanyahu insisted. "We've redeployed in Hebron and fulfilled other commitments; but the Palestinians have not."

Asked why his government had not approved any new settlements, the premier said: "We decided early on that any decision on a new settlement would require the full cabinet's approval, and we haven't brought any for approval so far."

But surely, he was asked, he could have gotten approval from his cabinet, had he asked for it?

"I think we have contented ourselves with allowing the growth of existing settlements," Netanyahu answered. "They're growing. I don't think they're growing quite at the pace at which they grew under the Labor government, and I don't say this with any particular pride. They expanded by nearly 50 percent of the population under Labor.

"That didn't seem to be such a hindrance toward peace then, the way it is presented now."

Netanyahu defended his proposal to shelve the frustrating quest for interim agreements – which he described as potential sources of new friction and violence – in favor of final status talks. He denied that the suggestion was a tactic designed to avoid further troop redeployments in the interim.

The only reason for postponing additional troop pullbacks, he said, would be the PA's failure to act against terrorists and terrorism.

The parties should "cut to a final agreement," Netanyahu said, because "the incremental process erodes confidence, with each side eyeing a final settlement." He contended that an immediate advance to final status talks "would enable the parties to cut the Gordian knot" that breeds frustration and violence.

Netanyahu rejected Arafat's definition of the demand for the arrest of 150 people on Israel's "wanted" list as a "dictate," asking: "What good is it for us to make new concessions, give more pieces of land that will simply be used as launching grounds for additional terrorist attacks against us?"

Netanyahu also rejected the idea of statehood as a feasible form of Palestinian self-determination. He cited security considerations as the main reason.

He argued that sovereignty would enable the Palestinians to forge military alliances with Iraq and Iran, challenge Israel's control over the air space west of the Jordan River and deploy weapons near Tel Aviv.

"The 20th century shows that symbolism becomes reality," he said, suggesting that "there are other models for a final settlement" besides statehood.

Turning to the territorial aspect of the Palestinian-Israeli dispute, Netanyahu cited his "Allon-Plus" plan as a viable proposal, noting that it would have to provide "defence-security zones," while at the same time "balancing Israeli and Palestinian needs."

In the end, he argued, "only we – Israelis and Palestinians – could determine the prerequisites for coexistence in peace and security."

Netanyahu dismissed media reports charging that he would prefer to concentrate on resurrecting the moribund negotiations with Syria rather than go on dealing with the PA. The reason for this was said to be the increasing complexities of the core issues yet to be aired: Jerusalem, refugees and borders. But by bringing the final status talks forward, Netanyahu said, these issues would be taken up sooner rather than later.

With regard to peace talks with Syria, Netanyahu said he was "encouraged" by President Hafez al-Assad's role in the joint Israeli-Syrian effort to wind down the recent escalation in southern Lebanon. He credited the Syrian leader with reining in the Iranian-backed Hezbollah guerrillas, thereby avoiding further bloodshed.

However, Netanyahu described as a nonstarter Assad's demand that the armistice line existing from mid-1949 to June 4, 1967 be the outer limit of the Syrian forces' deployment in the aftermath of a proposed Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

"The Syrians are torpedoing the peace talks before they resume," he said, indicating that the only acceptable cartographical term of reference was the political boundary between Palestine and Syria dating back to the British mandate.

"The Syrians simply want to get down to the water," Netanyahu said, referring to Lake Kinneret, on whose northeastern shore the Syrian army was camped until the outbreak of the Six Day War.

Netanyahu also ruled out a return to the Green Line, saying it would trigger "internal conflict" within Israel. At the same time, he expressed surprise at the PA's apparent notion that its territorial objectives could best be achieved by the return of a Labor-led coalition to power.

Israel "couldn't redeploy" in Hebron under Labor, he recalled, adding immediately, "We could do it."

Syrian track frozen as Albright visits region

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Madeleine Albright, the American secretary of state, is scheduled to begin her first tour of the Middle East this week. Among the countries she will visit is Syria, widely recognized as Israel's main military rival and the key to a comprehensive settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Mideast Analysis

In the view of observers, Albright will quickly learn that the prospects for a peace treaty between Israel and Syria are virtually nil at this juncture.

Israel broke off bilateral talks with Syria in February 1996, following Syria's refusal to condemn a spate of Palestinian suicide bombings in Israeli cities. Since then, the negotiations have been frozen and both sides have accused each other of war-mongering.

Israel's position is that it is ready to resume the discussions, which were last held at the Wye Plantation in the United States, "without prior conditions." Syria, too, is prepared for talks, but only at the point they left off. Therein, as Albright will discover, lies the problem.

President Hafez Assad claims that the late Israeli premier, Yitzhak Rabin, orally agreed to a complete withdrawal from the Golan Heights — to the June 4, 1967 lines — in exchange for peace. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu counters that informal understandings reached by Israel and Syria are not binding on his government.

According to Itamar Rabinovich, Israel's former ambassador to Washington and its chief negotiator with Syria, Rabin never promised to withdraw, but simply made a commitment to seriously discuss this pivotal issue, provided Assad was amenable to Israeli security demands, open borders, diplomatic relations and normalization.

What seems clear is that Israel and Syria were in fact inching toward a viable accommodation. Syria's envoy in Washington and its chief negotiator, Walid Moualem, believes that the two countries were on the verge of an agreement in 1995.

This may be true. But it's also worth remembering that at the conclusion of one of their last negotiating sessions in 1996, neither side was in an upbeat mood. Ehud Barak, then Israel's foreign minister, said that he did not expect any breakthrough in the near future. Radio Damascus voiced disappointment with the pace of progress, and Assad ruled out a summit with either Rabin or his successor, Shimon Peres.

Since last year's election in Israel, the situation has gone from bad to worse. Netanyahu has repeatedly declared that Israel, for security reasons, cannot give up the Golan. However, at President Bill Clinton's urging last March, he acknowledged that United Nations Resolution 242 — which calls for trading land for peace — is applicable to the Golan. Foreign Minister David Levy has conceded that point, and several Likud Knesset members have announced their willingness to consider a pullout from the Golan.

To Syria, these are hollow gestures, given Israel's reported intention to build new housing on the Golan, the cabinet's decision to construct a dam on the Yarmuk River in an area claimed by Damascus, and Netanyahu's support for a proposed Knesset bill that would require any withdrawal to be approved by at least 80 members.

Syria has responded to these developments with expressions of anger and despair, though it has offered Israel peace with security in return for a full withdrawal from the Golan (and southern Lebanon).

Against the backdrop of fears that Israel and Syria are on a collision course, Syrian Defence Minister Mustafa Tlas has warned that Netanyahu's policies are leading the region toward war, and Assad has said that he is keeping his "options open."

Israel is also beset by a sense of foreboding, as witnessed by warnings from Israeli Chief of Staff Gen. Amnon Shahak and Israeli ambassador to Washington Eliyahu Ben-Elissar that Syria may be preparing for war. Can Albright put it all right? It's doubtful.

PA links security ties to further withdrawal

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian security officials have said that they are not cooperating with Israel regarding the investigation of the suicide bombings in Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market and Rehov Ben Yehuda, and conditioned such a step on Israeli implementation of further IDF redeployment in the West Bank.

Mohammed Dahlan, chief of the Palestinian Authority's (PA) Preventive Security Apparatus in Gaza, said his agency is prepared to cooperate with Israel "on condition that it participates in the peace process. This means implementation of the interim agreements signed until now."

Samir Mashrawi, an aide of Dahlan, said at this point the Palestinians and the Israelis are conducting separate investigations into the suicide bombings in Jerusalem. But he added that neither side is exchanging information.

Mashrawi said the PA investigation has not turned up information on the identities of those behind the bombings.

Israeli security officials said they have detected increased willingness by the PA to cooperate with the investigation. But they said the new attitude is a demonstration meant for U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, scheduled to arrive in the Middle East this week.

Palestinian sources said Arafat — attending a summit with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordan's King Hussein — was accompanied by a senior Palestinian security official to Cairo to explain to the Egyptians the PA investigation into the suicide bombings.

Recently, the West Bank head of the PA Preventive Security Apparatus, Jibril Rajoub, was stopped at a Border Police roadblock outside Jerusalem. In a rare step, the border policemen searched Rajoub's car and seized weapons that Israeli sources said were unlicensed by the IDF.

In the last few days, PA security has also been tighter.

Vancouver dentist wounded in Jerusalem bombing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — Sherri Wise, a 27-year-old Vancouver dentist on her first trip to Israel, received burns to her arms, legs and face in last week's triple suicide bombing on Ben Yehuda Street.

Wise is believed to be the only Canadian injured in the blast. Speaking by phone from her room in Hadassah Hospital to The CJN in Toronto, she recalled "lots of bodies, blood and people scattered about."

The only indication of danger, she realized in retrospect, was seeing a man dressed as a woman on her way to lunch. (News reports said at least one bomber was disguised as a woman.)

Wise was having lunch with two other people at the Village Green restaurant when the bomb went off.

The next thing she remembers is "being on the ground. The ambulances came [in what seemed like] two seconds, and the police and soldiers were everywhere. People who weren't hurt were helping other people. I just remember being totally out of it, just trying to breathe and just trying to know that I was alive and that I was going to see my family again."

She recalls looking for – and finding – her purse. "I didn't want anyone to find my passport without me being attached to it," she explained. Both her companions survived the blast, although one was "more seriously" injured.

Wise, who arrived in Israel Aug. 13 to volunteer for a month at a dental clinic for underprivileged children through Dental Volunteers for Israel, plans to cut her stay short and return to her parents' home in Winnipeg as soon as she is out of the hospital, likely this week.

On Friday, the day after the bombing, Wise had "literally hundreds" of visitors, including schoolchildren and representatives of the Canadian Consulate and the United Jewish Appeal.

Buoyed by the visits, Wise said she felt much better. She was on medication to manage pain from first, second and some third-degree burns.

Wise said she didn't fear bombings before leaving for Israel. "If it's going to happen, it's going to happen. I wish it hadn't happened. I feel bad that other people were hurt. [We were in] the wrong place at the wrong time."

Wise was very taken with her first experience in Israel. "I loved it. I went to Masada and climbed it. I went to the Dead Sea and thought it was the most beautiful thing. I went to the Kotel and prayed on Shabbat, and it was beautiful."

Within a day of the bombing, many people had asked Wise whether she would return to Israel. "I don't think I could take it in the near future, but probably one day. I don't know. I think I'd be very scared."

Outrage at attack

CJN Staff

TORONTO — In Canada, Jewish community leaders condemned the bombing while Prime Minister Jean Chrétien expressed "shock and outrage" at the attacks.

"Our thoughts and prayers at this moment are with the families of the victims and the people of Israel," the prime minister said.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's advocacy group on Israel, pointed out the attacks occurred only days before the scheduled arrival in the region of U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright for resumed peace negotiations.

CIC national chair Stephen Victor, said "the attacks occurred only days after Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was seen publicly embracing the leaders of Hamas and other Muslim extremist organizations. This was despite the Palestinian Authority's moral and legal obligation, under the Oslo Accords, to disarm and disband these groups, who have made no secret of their violent opposition to the very concept of peace with Israel."

Victor also called on the Canadian government "to condemn terror attacks against Israel and all other violations of the Oslo Accords by the Palestinian Authority. We also urge the Canadian government to demand the Palestinian Authority adhere to the obligations undertaken when they signed the accords."

Canadian Jewish Congress president Goldie Hershon said "Arafat must wage war against these terrorists if he wants peace [with Israel]. Peace and terror are incompatible."

Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region, said "these callous and calculating fanatics are not just at war with Israel, but with the ideal of peace. The international community must reject through deeds the use of terrorism as an element of politics. Israel must be supported in whatever measures it deems necessary to stop terrorism against its citizens."

B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) suggested the timing of the terrorist attacks after lifting of the closures and prior to Albright's visit "flies in the face of American initiatives to ensure the continuation of the peace partnership."

BBC spokesperson Frank Dimant said the bombings were "the natural consequence of [the] public rapprochement between Arafat and leaders of the terrorist organizations that perpetrate these horrible crimes. The embrace between these leaders can only be interpreted as a sign of cooperation, goodwill and support between the Palestinian Authority and those who would murder innocent civilians and destroy any chance for peace in the region."

Words are inadequate in the face of such horror and inhumanity, said Dvora Goodman, vice-president of the University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union. "My heart aches for the Israelis who have to live in dread and mourning."

Ilana Segal and Eyal Lewin, co-presidents of Ryerson Hillel, said the bombings have "once again highlighted the sharp disparity between the attitudes of the parties involved in the Israeli peace talks."

"It is unfortunate and very sad that followers of Hamas feel that violence will attain their goals," said Dave Gordon, editor-in-chief of the student publication Images and a student at York University.

Israel urged to investigate fate of missing Yemenite babies

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

KIRYAT SHAUL — There have been renewed calls to review the investigation into the fate of several thousand babies born to Yemenite and Oriental Jewish families who were allegedly taken from their parents in the 1950s and illegally sold for adoption, mainly to American families.

These calls were prompted in part by the pictures taken in the last month of Tsila Levine being reunited with her biological mother Margalit Amosi.

Levine went missing as a baby, 49 years ago, and was adopted by an Ashkenazi family. In her early 20s, she moved to the United States. DNA testing confirmed the mother-daughter relationship.

Although there have been several commissions appointed over the years to look into the matter, until now there has been no conclusive evidence as to the possible veracity of the story of the adoptions which prominent Yemenite community leaders have been claiming for many years.

There has also been a call to review the circumstances that led to the 1994 police siege at Yahud, near Tel Aviv, which resulted in the arrest, conviction and imprisonment of Uzi Meshulam, a well-known Yemenite rabbi.

At the time, it was said that Rabbi Meshulam and his followers were in dispute concerning the building of new apartments near to the rabbi's home and had barricaded and armed themselves to prevent the construction going ahead.

This was always denied by Rabbi Meshulam, who consistently championed the cause of the lost children and claimed that there was an official conspiracy to silence him over the matter of the missing children. He claimed that many prominent public figures and politicians were involved in the sale of the children for very large amounts of money.

In August, four graves were opened in Tel Aviv's Kiryat Shaul cemetery at the request of the families. Although each grave was marked, no remains of any kind were found.

That supports the long-held claims of many parents that their children were taken from them and given for adoption. The parents had been told that their children had died and been buried, but no parent of any single missing child had ever been to a funeral or seen the body of their child or been given a death certificate.

Menasche Babu, who was present at the opening of his daughter's grave, returned to the grave site a week later and gave The CJN an exclusive interview.

"I had twin daughters and I always thought that this was the grave of one of the twins who had died in infancy. I knew that this was supposed to be the grave of my daughter Ruti because the chevrah kadishah (the burial society) had given me a plan showing the grave's location.

"The chevrah kadishah informed me and the other three families, that they were going to open the graves of our children and they invited us to come to the cemetery on that day. They opened the grave and there was nothing — no body, nothing. We saw only weeds, nothing more.

" I don't know what became of my daughter or who took her. I have had no information for nearly 46 years.

"In January 1951, we came to Israel from Iraq. Some five months later my wife gave birth to twin girls in the Dejainy Hospital in Jaffa. When it was time to leave the hospital they gave us just one daughter saying that as we lived in a maabara (a tent camp) and the weather was very bad they would keep one of the children at the hospital. We would have her back, they said, when the weather was good. We left and went home.

> 'They opened the grave and there was nothing'

"After a month, we received a telegram to say that our daughter had died and she had been buried at Kiryat Shaul Cemetery, at plot number this and block number that. As we were olim chadashim (new immigrants) and knew nothing, we said — if she has died, she has died.

"However we found out after many years that the government had sold children of Yemenite, Iraq and Oriental families.

"There have been several government commissions looking into this matter and we were invited at times to give evidence. Nothing changed following these commissions. Up until today we do not know where our daughter is. Who took her? To what country was she taken? If she lives in Israel or abroad. We have no idea."

Ora Shifriss, a spokesperson for the Yemenite families, claims she has evidence that the trade in adoption was carried out with the knowledge, and in certain cases connivance, of leading political and public figures.

Shifriss is not satisfied that the present Cohen Commission, chaired by former Supreme Court justice Yehuda Cohen, will clear up the matter, as its terms of reference are too narrow and will not allow into evidence factors, which she says "are essential to the commission finding out, once and for all, the truth."

Shifriss wants Rabbi Meshulam to be released from prison, where he still has about 18 months of his sentence to serve, and be free to tell what he knows about the claims of illegal adoptions. She says that there would be a major political fall-out if the truth were exposed.

"Three years ago parents demanded that the graves of their children, whom they had been told had died in the 50s and buried in Petach Tikvah's Segula Cemetery, be given suitable grave stones, and this was done," says Shifriss.

"The manager of Segula Cemetery at the time said that the areas where the children's grave stones are located have no bodies beneath them, only sometimes a few small bags of non-descript bones and fetuses from abortions. We opened some of these graves about a year ago and asked that samples from 10 named graves be sent to a world renowned DNA testing laboratory in England and the results be checked against the parents.

"Such a test would solve this problem immediately. The laboratory in England wanted $150,000 to test all the 10 samples. Because the samples have been in the ground for a long time and are no longer live tissue, the tests are complicated and take a long time, this we know. The authorities said that they has no money, for this, it was too expensive. We are sure the parents had been given bogus burial locations of their children just to keep them quiet."

Shifriss says that several Knesset members have urged Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to authorize the tests and solve this "historical tragedy."

The Ministry of the Interior also holds the key to the problem explained Shifriss. "The testimony of a leading official of the ministry, who is responsible for all adoption records in the State of Israel held at the ministry, was heard only behind closed doors, even though the inquiry was ostensibly a public one. The biological parents of each and every child adopted in Israel are known by the ministry. The reason these records are kept is to avoid a brother and sister marrying by mistake. This is hypocrisy. For the ministry this is important, but abduction of Jewish children for money — this doesn't matter."

Yeshiahu Mansoura, head of the Yemenite community in Israel, has also appealed to leading public figures to use their influence to ensure the truth is now told and the guilty are not protected. He says, "It is a stain on the name of the Jewish people and Zionism which must be removed."

Israel ties with Croatia spark debate in Knesset

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Word that a country will establish diplomatic relations with Israel is generally welcomed as a sign of decreased isolation for the Jewish state.

But in the case of the former Yugoslav republic of Croatia, the applause is far from unanimous, and much of the criticism focuses on the country's leader, President Franjo Tudjman.

The two countries recently agreed to create formal ties next month.

The move came after Tudjman said he plans to visit Israel and apologize for his nation's persecution of Jews during World War II.

Tudjman's nationalist policies are viewed by many as an attempt to rehabilitate the fascist Ustashe regime that ruled Croatia as a Nazi puppet state during World War II.

Croatia had 25,000 Jews before World War II, most of them prosperous and largely assimilated. Some 20,000 were killed by the Nazis or the Ustashe regime.

Croatia decided to cede to Holocaust survivors its share of gold held by the Tripartite Commission, which is charged with returning Nazi-seized gold to European central banks. Britain, France and the United States agreed to freeze the gold while they review evidence that some of it was stripped by the Nazis from concentration camp victims.

The Israeli government's decision to establish ties with Croatia came under sharp criticism recently from Labor Knesset member Yossi Beilin, who said Tudjman had yet to fully repudiate writings which cast doubt on the number of people killed during the Holocaust.

Beilin said that when he was deputy foreign minister in 1995, he turned down a request by Croatia to establish ties, saying Israel would only do so if Tudjman removed anti-Semitic sections from his 1989 book, Wastelands of History.

Israeli officials viewed the book as anti-Semitic, and Tudjman subsequently issued a revised English version under a new title, Horrors of War, from which the most controversial parts were dropped.

The director-general of the Foreign Ministry, Eitan Ben Tsur, defended the decision to forge ties with Croatia, saying that Tudjman had removed the anti-Semitic sections from his book.

Ben Tsur added that Tudjman had offered to visit Israel and place a wreath at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial.

Beilin charged that the changes were made only in the English-language version of the book and that Tudjman has never publicly apologized for the remarks which still appear in the Croatian-language edition.

"He is simply a classic anti-Semite, and the statements in the book are scary. When such a person is president of a state, we have a problem," Beilin said.

He added that in his view, the only reasons Israel had agreed to establish ties with Croatia was because "all of a sudden we've returned to a state of international isolation, so we welcome anyone."

Another motivation was suggested last week by the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, which reported that the forging of ties will clear the way for Israel to sell Croatia more than $100 million in unspecified "non-lethal" weapons.

The paper quoted a senior political official as saying that negotiations between Croatia and Israeli defence industry officials began in 1992 after Israel joined the countries recognizing Croatia as a U.N. member-state.

Israel to lodge protest over grisly photos

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry expressed its shock over the publication of a photograph in the London-based daily Al-Hayat which depicts an Amal militiaman holding the severed head of an Israel Navy commando.

"It is most serious that the media in enlightened countries, which are supposed to uphold professional and moral standards, allowed the publication of such a shocking photograph," the ministry said in a statement.

The Israeli Embassy in London is to lodge a formal complaint with Britain's Press Council over the publication.

The features of the commando, one of 12 who were killed in the abortive operation in Lebanon, are clearly identifiable in the picture, which was distributed by Agence France Press and published on the front page of the Saudi-owned paper.

"Publication of this photograph was an act of barbarism," said embassy spokesperson Ron Prosor. "It contradicts all newspaper codes and journalistic ethics. We are devastated by the publication."

Other pictures in the paper depict the dismembered limbs and organs, including the heart, of other Israelis who were killed in the operation.

The Britain Israel Public Affairs Centre, a pro-Israel lobby in London, also announced that it will seek legal advice on action to be taken against Al-Hayat. The newspaper, which is regarded as one of the most influential among the elite in the Arab world, is based in London, but is printed simultaneously throughout the Middle East and in the United States.

The editor-in-chief of Al-Hayat, Jihad Khazen, told the Jerusalem Post he could understand why many people would find it "incomprehensible" that a supposedly reputable newspaper would decide to publish such a photograph. "As a reader, I didn't like it myself," he said.

He said the decision to publish was made jointly by senior editors at the paper because it had arrived via a widely distributed wire service and they believed other papers would publish the photograph.

"I was not on duty at the time, but I will not shirk my responsibility," he said. "Perhaps I would not have used it on the front page. Perhaps I would not publish something like it again.

"We at Al-Hayat are peaceniks," he added. "We just want this whole thing to finish."

Come see...what the Jewish Singles Registry is all about

If you have never been to a dating service before, here is the perfect opportunity to drop by the Jewish Singles Registry (J.S.R.) and see for yourself how a system which takes the "blind" out of "blind dating" works. Last April the J.S.R. held its first open house and the office was over flowing with interested individuals. "We were so busy, we didn't know where to turn to first" reported a jubilant Rob singer the J.S.R.'s owner and director. Rob promises that this time they will be even better prepared to handle the crowd. "We would like to spend a little more time with each individual when they come in" Singer continues. "There are so many benefits to joining our service that it is sometimes difficult to get the entire message out in such a short period of time. One thing we do try and stress at the onset is that there is virtually NO RISK in signing up with the Jewish Singles Registry. We GUARANTEE our service, and if someone doesn't get a minimum of ten dates within the first year of their membership, they get to stay in our service for free until they have had all ten dates. Nobody, to my knowledge, even comes close to a guarantee like ours". The Registry's success rate has been growing steadily throughout the years and the service is proud to announce that it is now averaging an engagement approximately every four weeks. While this unique system leads to many weddings and engagements, the J.S.R. also provides Toronto Jewish singles with an ideal way to meet and network with one another. Simply put in your request to meet someone (you first get to read, see and hear all about them) and the Registry staff puts the powers in motion. A phone call is made, usually that same day, to invite the person that you selected into their office to read, see and listen to your profile. When the person says yes, the phone number is given out. IT IS THAT SIMPLE!!

Another open house is scheduled for Sunday September 28, 1997 at their offices at 55 Eglinton Ave. E. #405, from 1-5 p.m. At the open house you will be able to meet the entire Registry staff, as well as read selected profiles of actual members, see their photographs, and listen to recorded voice personal messages. The afternoon promises to be educational, informative and fun. Just think how a few hours of your time on a lazy afternoon could very easily put you on the right track to meeting exciting, eligible, and dynamic Toronto Jewish singles.

Club Med In The City - Party

The J.S.R. is excited to announce that they will be presenting a Club Med In The City Party, an interactive get together designed specifically to meet and mingle with other Jewish singles. Official Club Med representatives will be on hand to lead the group through various fun and entertaining activities. Prizes will be awarded for the winning team. The event will take place on Sunday Sept. 21/97 at The Unicorn, 175 Eglinton Ave. E. beginning at 8:00 p.m. sharp. Live entertainment will also be provided to cap off the evening. Don't miss this one!!

More To Come

A lot of exciting things have been happening recently at the J.S.R. and Singer promises that there is a lot more to come. Whether you are looking to meet someone for friendship, a relationship or marriage, the time is right to sign up with the Jewish Singles Registry. They can be reached at 416-483-4151 or e-mail at jsreg@total.net.

KISS BLIND DATING GOOD-BYE
The Jewish Singles Registry offers you an unlimited number of introductions, that you select from an extensive Bio/Photo/Voice library. It's a great way for you to connect with people you would normally never get a chance to meet. So if you are looking for an attractive, fun, and simple way to meet other Jewish Singles, call the Jewish Singles Registry today.

Stride into fall with Mephisto

In autumn, as the weather mellows, invigorating exercise grows more appealing; and for North Americans, especially those whose work entails little physical labor, the major exercise is walking. It uses the whole body without undue exertion, maintains steady circulation to the brain -- and is safe enough to let us give free rein to our thoughts.

Since ancient times, great sages have advised us to make major decisions while walking. Aristotle's philosophy is called "Peripatetic", from the Greek for "walking about", because he lectured to his students while strolling with them in the garden of his school. And how many insights did the great Sherlock Holmes reach while restlessly pacing?

Without giving it much thought, we take thousands of steps daily; and each time, one foot bears our entire body weight. For this reason, and because vital nerves link the foot to the rest of the body, the state of our feet affects our overall health. And as we spend most of the day in shoes, our footwear in turn affects the state of our feet.

Mephisto footwear is designed with your total well-being in mind. With a style for every purpose — formal, casual or rugged — Mephisto shoes, boots and sandals are hand-crafted according to the best current knowledge. Their durable natural materials mould themselves to your foot and gait; and they are attractively styled in rich earth tones.

Every Mephisto model has a latex foam midsole, to make rough ground feel soft as a carpet; latex padding to cushion heel and joints; and a leather inner sole. For long walks on crisp autumn afternoons amid the changing leaves, Mephisto especially recommends its number one walking shoe for men and women: the Trampolin.

The Trampolin features a protective mudguard, and cleated sole to grip wet surfaces. The heel offers maximum shock absorption: each step causes it to compress, then expand, pushing you forward into the next stride and literally putting a spring into your step. The soles combine various materials in energy-saving air cushions; and the Trampolin is as solidly good-looking as it is sturdy.

Customers are the best advertisements; and while popular in their native France, Mephisto shoes find 85% of their expanding market elsewhere in Europe, Asia and North America -- both with celebrities, and people like you and me.

Join the Mephisto movement. You'll find Trampolins and other models at two Toronto boutiques: 1177 Yonge St. at Summerhill, (416) 968-7026; and 50 Bloor St. West, Concourse level, (416) 966-2568. You'll also find them in a Mephisto shop-in-shop at 182 Main St. in Unionville, (905) 940-0865. Call Ralph Benisty, Mephisto's Director of Operations for Canada, at (905) 881-0050 for further information on Mephisto's complete product line.

Celebrate with the stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant for 15 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 4 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 50 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Thursday, September 25, 1997 at the Paradise Banquet Hall, 7601 Jane Street, just north of Steeles and south of Hwy. 7. It begins at 6:00 p.m. and runs until 11 p.m. I am happy to announce that Windsor Bridal Salon, the largest bridal boutique in Canada, featuring 6,000 sq. ft. of bridal wear will present a full runway fashion show starting at 8 p.m. They will be showing Canada's fastest growing bridal collection...private label by G which features the latest styles, fabrics and trend setting customer service. This collection features the ultimate in bridal imagery. As an added bonus, Windsor Bridal will be holding a draw for a free wedding gown.

"There are a lot of bridal trade shows offered to the public," says Kay. "The Celebration of Stars Show" is geared solely to the Jewish community. All of the exhibitors rely on Jewish simchas for the core of their business."

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. You have the luxury of making an instant decision based on what you have seen, heard or tasted, or mull it over and decide at a later date. Many of the exhibitors will be offering show discounts and numerous give-aways. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras and DJ's. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proved to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information you can contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

NA'AMAT CANADA

PLANNED AND ASSET GIVING PROGRAM

"Why I Decided to Establish a Living Legacy for Na'amat"

RITA'S STORY

"When I became aware that Na'amat Canada had decided to actively secure Planned & Asset Gifts from friends and supporters like me, I requested an information package from Lorraine Levene."

"The many ways one can give are outlined and explained in Na'amat's Planned & Asset Giving Program pamphlet. They are broad and include a Bequest in a Will, which appealed to my desire to assure the continuity of Na'amat's Social Service programs in both Israel and Canada."

"I decided to name Na'amat Canada as a beneficiary of a fixed amount of money from my estate. My planned gift, when I pass on, will be paid to Na'amat to be used to fund the needs of women and children in Na'amat programs. I strongly encourage other friends and supporters to establish their planned or asset gifts to Na'amat."

Rita Tobias

SEVEN WAYS TO PROVIDE A LIVING LEGACY TO NA'AMAT CANADA:

1. Bequest in a Will - Your Will may be used to leave a specific amount or percentage of your estate.
2. Life Insurance - A new or old Life Insurance policy can be donated with the premium payments or cash value earning tax credits.
3. Assets and Property - Most valuable assets such as art, personal property, collections or antiques can be donated. A tax receipt is issued by Na'amat for the value of the gift.
4. Securities - You can transfer and donate stocks, bonds, GIC's and other securities to Na'amat and receive a tax receipt for the value of your donation.
5. Annuities - A percentage of your annuitized funds can be directed to Na'amat and tax receipts will be issued monthly or annually for the donated portion.
6. Remainder Trusts - The payment of a guaranteed amount to Na'amat is established through a Remainder Trust with significant tax savings now.
7. Strip Bonds - Government or Utility Strip Bonds can be donated with tax receipts issued for the purchase price of the bond.

New income tax regulations provide that we may now donate and receive tax savings for up to 75% of our net (after tax) annual earnings during our lifetime.

YES

❒ I wish to learn how I can financially support the future of Na'amat by arranging a Personal Planned or Asset Gift.

❒ Please send me a Na'amat Planned and Asset Giving Program Pamphlet.

❒ I would like to attend a Na'amat Planned and Asset Giving Program Seminar this Fall and would like to receive a seminar schedule.

Ashkenaz artistry attracted record crowd of 67,000

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The sights and sounds of Yiddish culture recently brought 67,000 people to Ashkenaz at Harbourfront Centre, double the number that attended the first such festival two years ago.

"We stretched the site and facilities at Harbourfront to their limit," said Ashkenaz artistic director David Buchbinder. "We knew we were on the right track, but the response amazed us."

The next Ashkenaz festival will be held in 1999, with one of the goals being to further break down the barriers between the artists and the audience, Buchbinder said.

The crowds were overflowing at the free music concerts and literary events. Even plays and concerts at paid venues drew near capacity attendance.

One exception was The Last Yiddish Poet. Buchbinder theorized that this unusual play by the Travelling Jewish Theatre from San Francisco suffered from the competition of free concerts by big name klezmer groups.

The Last Yiddish Poet, performed by two acrobatic actors, Corey Fischer and Albert Greenberg, is an inspiring and insightful view of Jewish history, with the accent on the present.

Donning clown noses when required and reverting to vaudeville-like antics and voices, they provided just enough skepticism:

"Is Yiddish dying?" asks the short Greenberg.

"Sick maybe, not dying," replies the tall, thin Fischer, a mischievous glint in his eye.

They footnoted Mordechai Gebirtig's song Avremi the Pickpocket with "He only stole from capitalists."

The Yiddish language was given to the Jewish people, "a golden language of the heart, dressed in rags," to enable continuity, the actors say.

A mainstream cultural production, Kapelye/On The Air, delighted the audience with its spoof of The Yiddish Radio Hour broadcast in Toronto in the old days.

New lyrics to Sixteen Tons transferred the locale to a delicatessen and the post-Lindbergh ditty, Charley Levine, the Flying Jew, was among the favorites.

The musician actors, Eric Berman, Adrienne Cooper (vocals), Ken Maltz, Henry Sapoznik and Peter Sokolow blended commercials for Fogelman's Hats with the old favorite, Abi Gezunt.

One of the stars of this show, Adrienne Cooper, went on to the Studio Theatre a half hour later, where, with pianist/arranger Zalmen Mlotek, she dazzled everyone with Ghetto Tango.

Ghetto Tango tapped into the black humor, rage and anxiety of the Holocaust artists who sang and played in order to live. If Ghetto Tango doesn't return to Toronto as part of the next Ashkenaz or even sooner, someone is overlooking a sensational act.

With The Dybbuk, Ashkenaz moved to a different aspect of Jewish culture. For this reviewer, the production by the non-Jewish Polish troupe from Bialystok was too cold, formal and moralistic.

Their use of icons to portray the bodies of the participants as separate from the souls seemed to heighten the barriers between the actors and the audience.

The troupe gets full marks for staging, lighting and special effects, but their interpretation of S. Ansky's play, while perhaps valid from the viewpoint of Poles deploring the Holocaust, lacked a human factor.

The Memoirs of Gluckel of Hamelin, another Ashkenaz showpiece, represented Buchbinder's search for creative, original pieces and new voices.

It tells the life story of a German Jewess (1646 to 1724) who successfully takes over her husband's business after his early death, while raising several children.

Many unusual theatre techniques are employed, along with a musical score reminiscent of how old radio shows produced their sound effects.

This is theatre of the future, an attempt to lighten up some Jewish folkways and portray the presence of women more powerfully than has been done in the past.

It may not have been everybody's cup of tea, but the hard-working collaborative team of Jenny Romaine, Frank London and the irrepressible Adrienne Cooper of New York's Great Small Works company, deserve to be commended for their efforts.

LEO FRANK SUBJECT OF LIVENT PRODUCTION

Livent chairman Garth Drabinsky and veteran director Harold Prince are joining forces to mount a Toronto workshop production of Parade, a new musical based on the true story of Jewish-American factory manager Leo Frank.

The show's book is by award-winning playwright Alfred Uhry, its score by 27-year-old composer-lyricist Jason Robert Brown. The production will feature 30 actors with Brent Carver and Carolee Carmello in the lead roles.

Rehearsals begin this week in Toronto and New York, culminating in three private workshop performances here in mid-October.

In 1913, Atlanta resident Frank was accused of murdering Mary Phagan, a 13-year-old white Christian girl employed in his factory. The musical tells a bittersweet and intimate love story of the relationship between Frank and his wife, Lucille Selig Frank, "set" – as a Livent press release dramatically paints it – "against the backdrop of one of the most explosive and troublesome periods in American history."

Uhry, who was born and raised in Atlanta, has a direct connection to the story. His great-uncle owned the pencil factory where Frank worked and his grandmother was a friend of the Frank and Selig families.

The compelling case of Frank was the basis of a 1937 film and an acclaimed 1988 made-for-TV movie. Frank is also the subject of a provocative new novel The Old Religion by playwright-filmmaker David Mamet, whose October publication date should coincide with the Toronto workshop.

Livent's announcement of Parade came only one day after its acclaimed production of Ragtime closed here to prepare for a planned opening in New York in late December. Given that Livent's earlier production of Show Boat also moved to the Big Apple, will Parade likewise follow the parade to Broadway one day?

Fashion Fantasia: Members of the Bernard Betel Centre don outlandish outfits to perform in this comic fashion show that has already charmed many seniors' groups in recent months. "You just don't stop laughing," say those who have seen it. Directed by Roz Livingstone, the next hilarious performance is scheduled for Sept. 10, 1:30 p.m. at the Bernard Betel Centre, 1003 Steeles Ave. W., west of Bathurst Street.

Tickets are available at the door for $4 ($3 for members). Includes refreshments. 416-225-2112.

Dance of Mourning: Stabat Mater –Mother Was Standing is a new dance work by Georgie Donais that explores themes of loss and grieving and the implications of a Christian belief system on Western society. The sizable and talented cast includes singer-dancer Aviva Chernick, who in previous productions has explored themes related to the Holocaust.

Winchester Street Theatre. Sept. 18 to 21, 8 p.m. with 2 p.m. Sunday matinee. Tickets $10 to $12. 416-535-1689.

• Hear Charly Sibony's Sephardi and Moroccan music on Sept. 14, Ronnie Wiseman's Klezmer Reggae on Sept. 21, and Hu Tsa Tsa Klezmer on Sept. 28. Sunday brunch, 11 to 3, performances at 12:30 p.m. At Bella! Did Ya Eat? 320 College St. Reservations, 416-967-1078.

Film tells urban tale

By CINDY WAXER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Despite the film's provocative title, The Mao Lounge isn't about the Chinese Communist leader's red velvet couches.

Written and directed by Jewish filmmaker Chad Derrick, 24, The Mao Lounge is a slice-of-life contemporary urban tale that chronicles the experiences and perspectives of a young man, surviving in the modern landscape of downtown Toronto.

"The film is really about a young person trying to find their place in an urban setting," says Derrick.

Screening at this year's Toronto International Film Festival as part of the Perspective Canada Short Programme, The Mao Lounge greatly differs from Gen-X films such as Reality Bites that attempt to capture the modern sensibilities of today's youth through witty repartee.

Instead, the black and white film uses its characters' facial expressions and suggestive body language to convey what would normally be stated through dialogue. "I thought it would be more honest to try to present these people's stories and the things that were going on in their lives through suggestion, through understatement, through evocation," says Derrick.

The result is an engaging film that encourages audiences to arrive at their own interpretations of the characters' thoughts and motivations.

"I think it was very important for me to invite people in and create their own story out of these people's stories," says Derrick.

Particularly compelling are the peculiar actions of the film's wiseman character who wanders the streets of Toronto's Kensington Market, exchanging cryptic glances with the film's protagonist.

Complete with a sage-like beard and black hat, the character is brilliantly brought to life by an actor whose name is mysteriously listed in the credits as solely Heshi.

"He's not playing an Orthodox Jewish person, he's actually an Orthodox Jewish person," Derrick says.

A self-described "labor of love," Derrick started penning the script for The Mao Lounge in November of 1994 while attending York University's film program.

As a student, he acquired vast experience writing, directing and producing several notable short films including Greenwood which represented York University in the short documentary category at the 1993 TVO Telefest.

On graduating in 1996, Derrick had finally cast The Mao Lounge's talented actors and was ready to begin shooting with the assistance of his hand-picked crew.

"That's one thing I learned in doing this. You better be in love with the project otherwise you're just going to give up on it. There's no other process like this. I've written before, I've written prose and I've written poetry and those are immediately gratifying. But with [film], you have to wait two and a half years to see what was in your head," he says.

And now that The Mao Lounge is screening at the Toronto International Film Festival, Derrick will be able to witness the impact his film has on its viewing audience.

"It's going to be very interesting to see how audiences engage with the movie at the Festival. That's the most curious thing for me. You spend 2½ years making a movie with the objective of showing it to people and now that's what's going on."

Screenings are scheduled for Sept. 10 at 6:30 p.m. and Sept.11 at 9:15 a.m. at the Varsity 1 Cinema, 55 Bloor Street West.

Assessing the Financial Climate

The last couple of years have seen some extraordinary returns in both the bond and stock markets. Bonds have yielded some terrific gains as interest rates have declined to historic lows and stock markets in both Canada and the United States regularly test new highs. The perplexing question that seems to be on every investor's mind now is: "When is the tide going to change?"

S. Jonathan Kirshblum, Investment Executive

No one knows precisely when market corrections will occur or which direction interest rates are heading. Experts espouse market forecasts daily, and daily they are proven wrong. Financial Advisors are often confused for fortune tellers. Nothing could be further from the truth. So, how do we make investment decisions without a crystal ball?

The most important step in any investment is realizing the risks associated with the investment and being comfortable with the risk. The market can always drop immediately after investing in an equity mutual fund. Interest rates can always rise immediately after purchasing a bond or GIC. The prudent question is not "When is the best time to invest?" but rather, "Are my investment objectives still achievable even if my timing is not ideal?"

A young RRSP investor considering equity mutual funds for long term growth should not be overly concerned with market timing. Even a 20% market correction immediately following an initial investment will not have a great impact on the long term results (see the Dalbar reports). This type of investor is better served obtaining advice on which mutual funds suit their individual objectives, rather than seeking opinions on short term market direction. History has proven that equities as an asset class outperform all other asset classes over the long term. The lesson to remember, says Sir John A. Templeton, is: "It is time, not timing" that will reward investors in the stock market.

People entering retirement years typically require income from their investments. Until a few years ago finding rates of 8 - 10% was not difficult. Today, the interest rate environment is drastically different. At the time of writing, five year Canada bonds are getting 5.30% and 10 year Canada bonds about 6.00 %. Nonetheless, an investor's preoccupation should not be "How am I going to find yesterday's rates?" but rather, "Are my income requirements satisfied by investing my available capital at current interest rates?"

Alternative investments that have potential for higher yields may be pursued if present rates are inadequate for income needs. They will entail larger degrees of risk. The resurgence in the REIT market as well as the billions of dollars that are pouring into the new Royalty Income Trust market clearly show that many income investors are prepared to accept greater degrees of volatility in their principal in exchange for higher income. For the most part, this new asset class has performed very well and there are frequent New Issues emerging (this month look for BCI and CP Hotels). A word to the wise: caution should always be exercised when entering any new asset class that has no track record, especially if interest rates should rise. Be selective in this market and never buy solely based on yield.

There are many uncertainties in the market. Prudent investing requires that a longer term approach be taken especially when participating in the stock market. If you are invested in the stock market now, then hopefully it is because you are prepared to stay invested for some time through a potential correction and recovery. If your financial plan involves exiting the market within the next 18 months, locking in capital gains now should be a strong consideration. If you are seeking investment income and require more than prevailing GIC rates, I would suggest using the Government of Canada Yield Curve as a benchmark for comparative credit and yield analysis.

Artist employs spiritual realism in interpreting biblical scenes

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Call it spiritual realism. Michael Erdos' experimental series, Once in a Millennium, at Holy Blossom Temple's annual High Holy Days Art Exhibit, is a provocative interpretation of passages from the Bible.

The show, which runs from Sept. 10 through Oct. 31, also features works by Elaine Clarfield-Gitalis and Richard Unger.

Erdos' Once in a Millennium refers to the year 2000 that, he says, is a singular time for millions of people "that will come and go and never come again. It says to us and to generations to come, that we recognize our place in biblical history, for without the Bible there would be no year 2000 nor a millenium to celebrate."

His works pay tribute to the Book of Books which, he says, binds us all in its spiritual force.

Yet he questions a sometimes "cynical" G-d.

Tower of Babel, a bas-relief in media ranging from fragments of windshield glass garnered at car crash sites, to clay and metal, is arresting. Erdos has dyed the glass purple, green and blue highlighted with gold, and painstakingly constructed the tower on supports representing Roman, Art Deco, Turkish Gothic, Sumarian, Thai and Indian architecture.

Attempting to capture the intent of the original tower, which he says was built to unify diverse people through a common language, he wonders why G-d wanted to destroy it.

In Ruth and Naomi, Erdos has painted a haunting portrait of the moment the two women are about to part. Naomi, the mother who has lost her son is returning home from Moab where she has been living since famine struck her own land and Ruth, her daughter-in-law the Moabite, who has lost her husband, is refusing to stay with her people. Declaring, "Whither thou goest,

Stress reduction device leads to Tranquility Base

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The founder of Tranquility Base began his search for the best method of reducing stress some five years ago.

Morry Zelcovitch's company specializes in stress reduction, where clients come for personalized sessions that enable them to achieve total relaxation.

The session begins by sitting in a reclining chair and donning goggles and earphones connected directly to the Digital Audio Visual Integrated Device (DAVID). Light and sound are emitted to induce a hypnotic or meditative state, and for the next half hour or so, it's total relaxation.

Zelcovitch, 35, turned to the Internet to further his search for stress-reduction methods. He believed that the state of relaxation could be achieved by an electronic device and was determined to find the best product in the world.

He found the DAVID system, which is manufactured in Edmonton, through an Internet site in New Zealand.

Zelcovitch travelled to Alberta to meet the manufacturer and test the product. DAVID was developed 15 years ago at the request of the University of Alberta, which commissioned the device for a project to help people overcome stage fright.

"The project was so successful the company went into full production," Zelcovitch said.

There are many similar devices on the market, but he chose DAVID because its development was based on sound scientific, medical and psychological research. The company combined research on brain chemistry and the effects of meditation on mind and body with prior studies on the healing powers of light, he explained.

"I was impressed by how responsible this organization was. The manufacturer was conducting ongoing research and was very open to questions."

Zelcovitch was very excited by his first sessions on DAVID, he added. "I tried many other devices, but the experience was unlike any I ever had. After the first try I felt energized. I felt vibrant. The feeling lasted for two or three days."

Zelcovitch, who has an honors degree in psychology, took the intensive training course offered by the company for using the DAVID system. "I wanted to bring the equipment and the training to Toronto to work with people with stress-related problems," he said.

In the last six months, he has been designing stress-reduction packages for both individuals and corporations. Additionally, he has been educating the public on the many benefits of DAVID.

Zelcovitch found that he has been able to help people with sleep and pain disorders. He has seen people improve their performances at work, as well as develop better coping strategies for day-to-day stresses. "I couldn't believe the results I was getting. People were reporting that they were feeling younger, less aggravated," he said.

He contends that the stress in our lives upsets brain waves. "We've grown up believing that feeling stressed is a natural state, and so people feel they have to cope with it as best they can. The DAVID system normalizes the brain waves and takes you back to the state [of mind] that nature intended."

ART EXHIBITION

An exhibition and sale of recent works by artist Albert Soren will take place Sept.14 10:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the Civc Garden Centre, Edwards Gardens on Lawrence Ave. E. and Leslie St.in Toronto.

Scenes from the bible

there will I go; thy people shall be my people," Ruth insists on accompanying Naomi.

Erdos mutes the warm colors of the desert in harmony with the pathos of the scene.

Samson and Delilah, a crisp artist's proof in pencil, takes a different approach to the generally accepted story of feminine betrayal. Samson appears in all his muscular glory while Delilah leans cozily against him. A sly smile hovering about her lips suggests, "Just you wait, you macho male!"

Erdos, who holds a masters degree in Political Philosophy from McGill University and studied art under Norman Rockwell in Westport, Conn., has experienced numerous careers and jobs: marketing executive, art teacher, advertising illustrator, truck driver, even herbal farmer. He now works at his first love, art, striving toward new frontiers.

In a whimsical but pointed political mood, he is also currently marketing a stuffed voodoo-type doll resembling Ontario premier Mike Harris.

For art inquiries, contact Erdos at 905-677-0166.

Maccabi juniors register record medal haul

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's junior Maccabi athletes have returned from Hartford with enough gold to bail out Bre-X.

In a record-setting performance, 100 Toronto Jewish athletes captured 101 medals, including 52 gold, 31 silver and 18 bronze at the JCC North American Maccabi Youth Games.

It was Toronto's best ever showing at the annual summertime extravaganza and included first-ever medals in boys volleyball (gold) and table tennis (three silver), said Jim Emery, a spokesperson for the Toronto contingent.

Toronto's medal count was greatest among all participating communities, which included contingents from across the United States, from Canada, Israel, Australia and Britain. Twelve hundred athletes participated in the regional event, while parallel games were held in Kansas and Seattle. Next year, Detroit will host a single JCC/Maccabi Youth Games.

Swimmer Nir Rotenberg led the Toronto medalists with nine gold. Swimmer Beth Albert was next with eight gold and one silver followed by track and field star Anthony Daniels, with seven gold and two bronze.

Daniels, a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), scored gold in long jump, high jump, shotput, 11-metre hurdles and the 400-m hurdles. He also won the "sheshathlon," a grouping of six events, as well as a team gold in the 4 x 100-m relay.

His bronze medals came in the 100 and 200-m sprints.

A track and field athlete since he was in Grade 9, Daniels, 16, says his best event is the 110-m hurdles. At first, it was the most difficult event to master, since runners must maintain the right pace to take three strides while covering nine metres between jumps, Daniels said.

Daniels, who trains three times a week at Athletiques International, has finished as high as fourth in the Metro Toronto region in the hurdles event. He plans to run the hurdles for CHAT this year and join the school's cross-country team.

Ari Sargon, a USDS Bayview student who recently entered CHAT, came home with a silver medal as a member of the Toronto basketball squad.

Consisting of a nucleus of players from the JCC Blue Demons, the Toronto hoopsters lost to a team from Mid Westchester (New York) 45-40 in the final.

Toronto trailed their U.S. rivals throughout the game by a two to five point margin and were never able to close the gap.Towards the end of the game, Toronto was forced to take two fouls, allowing the Americans to score three unanswered points and put the game away, Sargon said.

The game, though a loss, was Sargon's most exciting moment in sport. "A lot of Toronto kids from other teams were there and the crowd was really loud. We were really motivated," he said.

Sargon, 14, said that the experience far exceeded even the Blue Demons' quarter-final match in the Ontario AAAA championships. "We worked hard for three months for four days of basketball. We knew we'd remember it for the rest of our lives," he said.

Toronto was 6-0 going into the final.

For Craig Podolsky, 16, winning gold in baseball was rewarding though not particularly dramatic. In fact, the gold-medal game was rained out so Toronto won on the basis of its overall record and an earlier 4-2 win over silver medalists, Hartford.

Toronto was 6-0 in a double round robin format against teams from Hartford, Boston and New Jersey. The Canucks relied on good defence and team speed in the field to register the wins, Podolsky said.

A member of the Thornhill Rep Team that plays in the York-Simcoe League, Podolsky said the pitching was not generally as strong as he'd see back home.

He attributed the gold to "the team really [playing] well as a team."

Tight defence, team speed

The Inside Back

Complex legal issues apply to prayer at Kotel

BY JONATHAN SHIFF

The Tisha b'Av expulsion of Conservative Jews from the area near the Kotel received a lot of media attention.

However, most of the Israeli papers gave only cursory coverage to the legal issues involved. This is a shame since the matter is likely to find its way to court at some time.

The issue of prayers at the Kotel is regulated by the Law of Protection of the Holy Places, which was passed just two weeks after the Six Day War. The regulations include a long list of activities that are forbidden at the holy places. One of these is the "performance of a religious ceremony not according to the custom of the place..." An appointed official is permitted to give instructions to ensure the efficient implementation of the rules and is also permitted to eject anyone doing one of the above forbidden activities.

Before Tisha b'Av, a group of Conservative Jews gave notice that they intended to conduct a religious service in the evening, in which men and women would sit together. The police set aside a place for them in a nearby parking lot from which they could partially see the Kotel. A few minutes after they began the service, the appointed official stated that they had to stop, since they were praying in a manner that is not according to the custom of the place. As a result, the police ejected them.

The first question one must ask is whether the place where they were praying is part of the Kotel, because if it is not, then the appointed official had no authority to eject them. The regulations define the Kotel as "the Western Wall and its plaza, including any structure and upper or underground passage to which the entry is from the plaza..."

The parking lot is not in the plaza, and while one can get to it from the plaza, the entry to it can also be from other places. If the court determines that the parking lot is not part of the holy place, then the rules do not apply there and the official had no legal basis for the action he took.

Secondly, the Conservative group argued that since they have been holding prayer services with mixed seating for years at the Kotel, that has become part of the "custom of the place." If this argument were accepted by a court, it would also remove the entire legal basis for the official's actions. A similar issue arose in the famous case of the Women at the Wall in 1989. At that time, the court made certain points which could be relevant to our case.

Court vice-president Menachem Elon said that the Western Wall plaza is essentially a synagogue and that women's prayer groups are not part of the custom in that synagogue. The purpose of the regulation is to maintain the status quo, and Elon was of the opinion that customs cannot be changed overnight without consensus. The other judges emphasized the fact that in recent decades the Kotel has also become a national site of importance to all Jews where non-religious activities take place.

Therefore, it is not accurate in their view to define it simply as a synagogue where traditional religious rulings hold sway.

Thus, the willingness of the court to view the mixed prayers as part of the custom of the place will likely be determined in part by which judges hear the case, whether they see the Kotel simply as an Orthodox synagogue and how much importance they attach to the feelings of the regular worshippers.

Another point: Israeli law requires all officials to act in a reasonable manner and not out of "foreign" motivations. In this case it is worth noting that since the rabbi of the Kotel passed away some time ago, there has not been an appointed official at the site, but that on the morning before the prayers were to be held the minister of religious affairs suddenly decided on the appointee and rushed through the process. The court may wonder whether the minister and his appointee acted out of concern to enforce the law, or as part of the religious and political battles currently being waged in the country. Should the court come to the latter decision, the actions could be ruled illegal.

The above is only a partial list of the questions this issue raises and is not intended to supply the answers. Nonetheless it may provide some reference points for the reader should the matter find its way into the courts, as everything in Israel seems to do.

ROASTED RED PEPPER SOUP WITH ELEPHANT GARLIC & SWEET BASIL

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY...

HERB CAPLAN WE SELL Amana FOR LESS

1111 Weston Road (S of Eglinton) 767-1655

4-5 red bell peppers
3 cloves elephant garlic (very lg. garlic cloves which are sweet)
2 cups chicken stock (or vegetable stock)
1 cup tomato sauce puree
1 tblsp honey
lemon pepper
5-6 fresh basil leaves

Roast or BBQ red peppers til skins are charred and shrivelled. Then roast or BBQ elephant garlic, leaving skins on til soft and skins are quite dark but not burned.

Remove peppers and garlic, place in plastic bag, tie the top and leave in about 15 minutes til skins peel off both peppers and garlic. Puree peppers and garlic in food processor til thick but not chunky. Toss in basil leaves and puree.

Transfer puree to a pot, add honey, tomato sauce, chicken stock or vegetable stock. Simmer til heated through; add lemon pepper to season, adjust chicken stock (or veg) to taste. Adjust honey, tomato sauce, and basil to taste.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My girlfriend and I have been going together for over a year. We are both in our 60s. She loves dancing to the point of addiction, I love it to a lesser degree. On evenings we do not see one another, I might visit a friend or have dinner with a colleague, she feels it's okay to go with friends to singles dances. This upsets me. I say singles dances are a place to meet members of the opposite sex and she already has a boyfriend. She compares our outings as being on the same level. I say dancing has a slightly intimate slant to it, while eating out is completely different. To keep her happy, I have agreed to her attending two single dances a month without me.

She feels she does not wish to comply with my agreement and says it is too rigid and controlling. She knows her attitude might break the relationship. Now you tell me, am I out of line? I also have a slightly jealous nature which does not help.

Dance Crazy

Dear Dance Crazy,

One of the main ingredients of a relationship is mutual trust. I think the hurdle you are having trouble with is the word "singles." You feel if your girlfriend is going to a singles dance then others will assume she is single and possibly try to get to know her for a bit more than just as a dance partner.

You are probably right. However you have to remember one thing, it's not what the other people think or do. You have to trust your girlfriend enough to know that she is there to dance, have fun and that's all. You have to trust her that she will set these other fellows straight from the beginning.

A dinner for two with a lady friend can be just as intimate. Jealousy is a difficult emotion to overcome, but if you don't get a grip on your feelings, you may lose someone you care about. If she really wants someone else, she doesn't need a singles dance to fulfil her wishes. She's chosen to be with you. Enjoy your relationship and don't read more into her enjoyment of dancing than necessary.

Remember the saying "If you love something let it go, if it comes back it's yours, if it doesn't it never was."

Shining a spotlight on our community

The love of Jews for their children is the stuff of legend. It is a theme that weaves through our literature and our music, and is simultaneously the source of innumerable bad jokes and the cause for quiet pride.

And yet, as Morris Zbar of UJA Federation points out in an article in this year's Community Focus supplement, the poor Jewish child is a fact of life, even in this relatively well-off community.

While community and volunteer agencies are aware of this sad fact, and make some effort to alleviate the children's plight, we can see that the problem is not being sufficiently addressed. And the situation is only exacerbated by the seemingly endless government cutbacks to the social security safety net.

This year's supplement, we hope, will encourage you, the readers of The CJN, to take some positive steps to help the growing problem of poverty in our community, especially that of children – not only on a personal level, but by encouraging your organization, synagogue or institution to take positive steps to help.

As always, this supplement throws light on the panorama of the Jewish community – from programs on university and college campuses, to volunteer opportunities, to new ways the community is reaching out to serve religious and educational needs. Reena, with its wonderful programs for the developmentally disabled, has a new home, and we are proud to feature them.

The supplement also marks the first in a series of three articles on kashrut in Toronto. You may agree with what is written, or you may object – but we hope it will give you much to ponder.

A community, any community, is the sum of its people, its institutions and organizations and its services. The CJN is glad to shine a spotlight on ours – even while hesitating over some of its shortcomings.

Child poverty a grim reality

By MORRIS ZBAR & MARA KOVEN
Special to The CJN

Judaism's traditional sources are replete with messages that stress the centrality of children in our value system. Children are seen as a blessing and as a means of ensuring the survival of our people, and every Jew, regardless of his affiliation, would seemingly accept this contention.

Yet in this wonderful community of Toronto, there are approximately 4,000 Jewish children living in poverty.

While definitions of poverty abound and income levels are manipulated to serve as yardsticks for various institutional definitions of this phenomenon, for us, poverty is simply an insufficient ability to provide for basic needs, including emotional and educational security.

Who are these children living in poverty?

Approximately 13 percent of Jews live at or below the poverty line, according to 1991 census data, and this includes one in every ten Jewish children under the age of 14. These 4,000 Jewish children represent 16.6 percent of all Jewish poor. While this is lower than the general child poverty rate in Toronto, it is not acceptable for our Jewish community.

Statistically, these children tend to come from single-parent families. People in single-parent families were two to three times more likely to be poor than were persons who lived in husband-wife families. Twenty-two percent of Jews living in single parent families lived below the poverty line, compared to the 8.6 percent in husband-wife families.

Immigrants accounted for 9.6 percent of the Jewish community in 1991, but constituted 17.8 percent of the Jewish poor. One out of five Jewish immigrants to Canada since 1981 is poor. (The country of origin is a factor with immigration and poverty. A disproportionate percentage of Toronto's Jewish poor were born in Eastern Europe, the FSU and Israel.)

As governments restructure and as society changes its views on the social safety net, the suffering of the poor increases.

The 22 percent cuts in social assistance can be translated as follows: a single Jewish mother with a child receives approximately $1,000 a month. After rent, which averages $650 for a one bedroom apartment in North York, she has approximately $350 to provide for the family.

Think about what $11.66 a day can purchase. If she is lucky to receive a rent subsidy, her ability to spend is increased $8.00 per person per day. However, the cancellation of 385 non-profit housing projects has made subsidized housing harder to receive. Waiting lists can be several years long.

The ongoing cuts to daycare have made it more difficult for the Jewish poor to access subsidized spots in Toronto. The $2.6 million cut in counselling services to women trying to escape violent spouses has a negative impact on many children who are witness to and affected by this horrible cycle, a problem our community is not immune to, attested by the 300 cases seen by Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS).

What do we, as a Jewish community, do to alleviate the suffering of Jewish children?

The community provides approximately $1.3 million annually in supplemental assistance. This program, funded by UJA Federation and administered by JF&CS, supplements welfare payments to approximately 500 units monthly. Over 31 percent of this caseload consists of single-parent families.

The Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) provides relief payments to newly arrived immigrants to help them get settled.

The community and its agencies provide subsidies for children in need to attend summer camps. Approximately 700 children are assisted in this way annually.

Approximately 600 children were recipients of a Passover assistance program that ensured they had sufficient food for the holiday.

These are but a few of the programs devised by the community to assist our Jewish children in need. Is it enough? The answer is an obvious NO! We need to do more as a community to ensure all of our children will thrive.

Jewish children carry a double stigma: the experience of their own poverty and the knowledge of being a member of a community that has a lower incidence of poverty than the general population.Shame and low self-esteem often result. Many parents suffer the indignation of being unable to buy sufficient clothing or to send their children to summer camps and on the same outings as their friends. Added to this is a lack of proper housing and nutritional concerns for these children.

Judaism values children. The way we care for and raise them will determine whether they grow into productive members of society. Self-sufficiency and the ability to positively contribute to society are strong goals for our children. Our failure to achieve these goals are reflections on us as parents and as a caring community.

The buck stops with us in addressing child poverty

By RABBI ARTHUR BIELFELD

My grandfather used to observe a custom which our congregation has adopted. Whenever he made the blessing over the bread, he would break off a small chunk and pass it around the table.

As a child, I thought this had some deep religious significance and I once summoned up the nerve to ask him why he did it. I've never forgotten his answer: "Because that's all the bread we could afford to eat at one meal." Then in a softer voice he murmured: "Some day it will be different."

Well, "some day" has arrived, but for many children it's not very different than it was then. It's difficult for those of us whose refrigerators are loaded with food even to imagine what it must be like for hundreds of thousands of Canadian kids who go to bed hungry and wake up hungry. But it's happening in homes all across Canada.

In 1989, Canada's parliament declared war on child poverty. It pledged to eliminate it by the year 2000. The millennium is just a few years away and our report card doesn't look very promising. Surveys show that the number of poor children in Canada has increased by 50 percent since 1989, to more than a million and a half today.

It's not just that these kids can't go to McDonald's, or go on school trips, or have enough warm clothing. Many of them are more likely to die as babies, to develop serious illnesses or disabilities. Cuts in welfare benefits mean their families have to pay the extra costs of medications, child care and transportation. Because of illness, poor children miss school more often. They are more likely to drop out before finishing high school. They have trouble finding well paying jobs or continuous employment. In the end, we all pay the price of their poor health and education, their dependence and their anger.

I don't want to get into the business of government bashing. For better or worse, many of us voted for the current federal and provincial governments and we'd better pray that they get a fix on the escalating number of families living in poverty. Instead of muttering how terrible things are, what can ordinary Canadians do to begin to turn them around?

Let me tell you what our congregation has done. We agreed to redirect our Ontario tax reductions towards the relief of child poverty. We persuaded United Way and Mazon Canada, to set up special funds for child poverty to meet the most urgent needs of the poor: nourishment, medical treatment and child care.

It's time that we stopped looking for someone else to blame. Sure, there are welfare cheats and bad parents and political leaders who devote their time to following the latest poll. But in the end, the buck stops here.

If each of us would reach into our pockets to help wipe out poverty, would write a letter to our government decrying this scandal, things would begin to improve very quickly. And even if we don't succeed in radically changing our society, at least by our actions we could prevent our society from changing us.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld is the spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El, Willowdale, and the Founding Chair of Mazon Canada, a Jewish response to hunger.

Tel-Aide reaches out

By REVA KAISER
Student Intern

When Esther said goodbye to her husband that morning as he left for work in his standard suit, tie and briefcase uniform, she was unaware of exactly how much her life would change within the next few hours.

Steve (not their real names) had been working at a prestigious Toronto law firm for years. In the past three months, although Steve would call her once or twice each day, he instructed her not to call the office: he'd be out for a meeting, he'd be busy with an important client.

But that afternoon, a small emergency arose and Esther had to contact Steve immediately; so she called the office. The receptionist informed a stunned Esther that Steve was no longer working at the firm. As a result of downsizing, he had lost his job three months earlier.

In a desperate need to talk to an understanding person and retain her anonymity, Esther called Tel-Aide, the Jewish distress line, where she found a responsive, kindly volunteer who listened to her confused, angry and fearful thoughts.

According to Bonnie Kates, chair of Tel-Aide, 25 to 30 percent of calls are related to financial difficulties and poverty, a number that has increased in the past five to eight years as the Canadian economy has plummeted and more of the population is dealing with reduced budgets.

Reduced budgets, though, can mean anything from one less yearly vacation to not enough food on the table. Parents call Tel-Aide because they are concerned about having to go on welfare, about losing their jobs, about having to move, about having enough money to feed their family. They are worried about how cuts will affect their children, and concerned about depriving them.

However, financial problems are often reflected in other difficulties.

One volunteer handled a caller who was concerned about her relationship with her husband. But after discussing the problem, the volunteer realized that the underlying source of friction was finances.

"When money is a factor, there's stress on the marriage, on family relationships – the family all suffers," said Marilyn Arkin, a longtime volunteer of Tel-Aide.

Children are obviously affected as well, Kates said, but Tel-Aide does not receive many calls from them. (Often, they will call the national Kids' Helpline.)

But parents frequently call with problems concerning their children.

One caller, Kates said, was upset because she did not have the financial means to afford a bar mitzvah bash for her son. Kates discussed the options with her and the caller came to the realization that there are many ways to celebrate a bar mitzvah, most of which are a lot more affordable than the party she had in mind. The caller was pleasantly surprised to hear that a backyard garden party with some cake and drinks would suffice.

Helping callers solve such problems is often just a matter of putting two heads together and thinking of creative alternatives.

But if the problem is lack of food, "no one should go hungry," Kates emphasized, and there are a number of organizations in the city, both Jewish and not, that the volunteers at Tel-Aide can refer the caller to.

Though hunger is the main concern, however, referrals go beyond food banks. Financial difficulties usually strain the family relationships, whether in the marriage itself, or between parents and children, and callers may need assistance with that. Often Tel-Aide will refer callers to the Jewish Family and Child Service or other organizations or professionals.

Aside from poverty-related issues, the bulk of Tel-Aide's calls deal with interpersonal relationships – marital, parent-child, boyfriend-girlfriend, or others. Callers phone in because they need an unbiased, kind and willing listener.

And that's what they find at Tel-Aide: the volunteers are there to listen.

When a caller phones, volunteers begin by assessing the situation and discussing the problem. During the course of the phone call, the caller and volunteer think out loud together and sort through everything, highlighting what the important issues are and setting goals to work through them.

Synagogues try to help those in need

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

There are those who live in three-car garage homes and wear designer labels. Others face eviction and frequently go hungry.

Certainly agencies are in place for families and individuals in need, but what is being done through our synagogues and temples to reach out and provide the extra, more personal help?

Not enough, according to Chabad Lubavitch of Markham's Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, who says that more on-the-spot aid is required.

His own shul which he says has limited resources, "does what it can." Although it is located in a generally comfortable neighborhood, he observes that "lately we are seeing people who are in danger of being evicted or have lost jobs.

"We need old-fashioned giving, a month's rent when they are short, or help finding a job, rather than another social worker to listen." He concedes that this is his personal perspective.

Shaarei Tefillah's Rabbi Moshe Stern, president of the Orthodox Vaad Harabanim, insists that much is accomplished, often "quietly." The Vaad makes plans, he says, "and we go back to our shuls to see what can be done."

The Chesed Fund in several shuls will provide a brit milah, a bar mitzvah or a wedding, for families who can't handle the expense. There is help as well for those with business or eviction problems.

At Shaarei Tefillah, members are encouraged to contribute to Tomchei Shabbos, which provides Shabbat meals for needy families. The congregation has also "adopted" about a dozen families, supplying money for food, clothing and Jewish education. They are also looking to resume their communal Pesach seders, where both those who can pay and those who cannot, are welcome.

Rabbi Stern observes that giving help is a private matter and people should speak to their own rabbis.

Pride of Israel Synagogue operates its own kosher food bank, started 3½ years ago by Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich when he first came to the shul.

Danger of eviction

"We see 25 to 30 people on an as needed basis, some weekly, others less often," says an office staff representative. "Now, persons are coming in who have never been to a food bank before." Most are referrals from Jewish social service agencies and groups such as Jewish Family and Child Service, B'nai Brith or the Bernard Betel Centre.

Hours are 9:30 to 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 to 3:30 p.m. Mondays through Thursdays and 9:30 to 11:30 a.m. Fridays. The food is purchased and augmented by donations from Chai Kosher Poultry and individuals. Such non-perishables as canned soups, tuna, vegetables, potatoes and frozen chickens are available. On the "wanted" list are pasta, juice, pink salmon, cereal, cookies, peanut butter, jam — kosher only, please.

Holy Blossom Temple has just completed its first year as a participant in the Out of the Cold program, which offers food and overnight shelter from mid-November until the end of March.

Doors open about 6 p.m. and a nourishing hot dinner is provided for up to 70 people, plus sleeping accommodation for 30. In the morning a substantial breakfast is served and guests, who are required to leave by 7:30, are given a bagged lunch and subway token or ticket. There is also a clothing exchange, where good garments can be substituted for inadequate ones. New socks, underwear and toiletries are often available as well.

"Our program has been very successful to date," says facilities manager Aaron Walderman. "We've had a surplus of volunteers from the congregation, which is wonderful and everything has run smoothly without incident."

Moved by Canada's shamefully high incidence of child poverty, Temple Emanu-El's social action committee and board recently initiated a campaign, sending letters to all congregants, urging them to donate whatever they can from their provincial tax savings to Mazon Canada which fights hunger, or to the United Way. Temple Emanu-El's Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, was instrumental in persuading the United Way to set up a special fund for the campaign.

In addition, each congregant was asked to contribute $25 toward an advertisement in a national newspaper, worded to stress the gravity of the situation.

A heartwarming response to a particular need is that of the Jewish Russian Community (JRC) which operates a day care centre for children of Russian immigrants. Founded in 1994 by Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman with funds donated for one classroom by JRC members, the Gelfand family, it has expanded to accommodate 55 children ages 1½ to five in three classrooms.

As well as freeing parents to prepare for life in a new country, the JRC day care offers the children a meaningful and happy exposure to their religion and roots, so long denied under the Communist regime.

"Ninety-nine point nine percent of us can deal with our problems, but we lack the motivation to do it," said Kates. Tel-Aide volunteers work on boosting callers' confidence in making the decisions they intrinsically know are right but are having a difficult time accepting.

All volunteers are Jewish from the full spectrum of backgrounds and can therefore connect with the callers. They must pass a six-week training course, modelled after the Distress Centres of Ontario's course (the umbrella organization of Tel-Aide) before manning the phones. Volunteers are trained in the technique of listening.

Tel-Aide's volunteers work three- to four-hour shifts, always with a partner, in case a situation arises in which emergency services must be alerted, such as suicidal callers.

Kates praises the 50 volunteers of Tel-Aide. "I believe we have among the best volunteers in the city…sensitive, caring, nurturing people."

Originally sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (now UJA Federation) when Tel-Aide was founded in 1985, the Stolero Family Foundation is presently the sole benefactor of the organization.

But it also fits with the anonymity the organization reflects, including a refusal to subscribe to Caller ID and the insistence that all calls are kept completely confidential.

Volunteering is immensely rewarding and it's a way of giving back something to a community that does so much for all its members, said Kates. "You get satisfaction when you know you have helped people through a difficult time, a difficult period."

Tel-Aide can be reached at 636-9610.

Immigrants view hardships with optimism for the future

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

This file photo of immigrants who recently arrived in Israel from Chechnya poignantly captures both the hope and the travail of starting a new life in a new land. [Brian P. Hendler/UIA photo]

Two community agencies, Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) and Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa (TJFLC), deal with child poverty on a regular basis.

According to Perry Romberg, executive director of the Toronto branch of JIAS, immigrants and their children may cope better with poverty than other groups living at or below the poverty line.

He said new immigrants are inclined to be optimistic about their future and view their financial hardship as temporary while long-time Canadian residents who have experienced years of living in poverty tend to feel more despair and pessimism about their circumstances.

The positive attitude of the new immigrants is usually filtered down to the children, Romberg said. "They [JIAS clients] have a dream that life will get better. They have a determination to make life better for themselves and their kids."

He said 98 percent of JIAS' clients (the agency is mandated to help newcomers in their first two years), come from the Former Soviet Union (FSU) where the average standard of living is equal or lower than their living standards in Canada.

He said in the FSU, multiple generations of one family often live in a small apartment. It's not unusual for a family to share quarters with an elderly aunt and newlyweds, and while new immigrants may continue this living arrangement in Canada, they now live in three-bedroom apartments compared with 1½-room dwellings.

FSU residents tend to be well educated and skilled, so with time they are able to find employment, sometimes holding down as many as three jobs so that they can move up the rungs of the socio-economic ladder, Romberg said.

"They have the potential to build on." He stressed that they work hard to provide their children with a better future. "Immigrants are here for their children."

He reported that children attend programs sponsored by the community such as summer camp at Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) and youth groups, and some children through their participation interact with children who are wealthier and have more material possessions. Russian children may not have bikes and many toys, but Romberg said he does not equate that situation with deprivation.

He said the Jewish communal organizations give money for food and decent housing to low income families to ensure that they live at a standard of living he described as "basic adequacy." But he made it clear that life for immigrants is hard whether they're on welfare or working two jobs.

Romberg noted that with the last recession, JIAS clients had more difficulty finding employment and getting those first few months of work experience in Canada, so more were on social assistance for longer periods of time in the '90s than in the '80s when jobs were more plentiful.

In contrast to the immigrants who start at the bottom rung of the ladder and move up, many middle class families were hit by this last recession and have seen their social economic status dip considerably, said Helen Futerman, office manager of TJFLC.

She said that in the last five years there has been a substantial increase in the number of people applying for subsistence loans, to cover the cost of basic necessities. These loans make up roughly 30 percent of the money lent by TJFLC.

She attributed the rise in subsistence loans to corporate downsizing and job loss, bankruptcies as well as family break ups.

Financial hardship creates stress, often leading to a marriage breakdown, she said.

TJFLC intake worker Bea Wolfe noted that roughly 30 percent of the people who apply for loans have children. She said she is seeing many more families whom two or three years ago she would have categorized as lower middle class. "The children may have been living in a middle class situation and now they're not."

She described one family which suffered significant financial loss when the family business went under: Both parents are working and the children have paper routes. "At the end of the week, the parents and kids pool their resources."

Many families have to overcome their pride to ask for financial help, Wolfe said. "Within the community you're seeing people not used to asking. They're used to making ends meet...It's a difficult time [economically]. We see tremendous affluence and it's deceiving."

COMMUNITY HEBREW ACADEMY OF TORONTO

C.H.A.T. is a co-educational Jewish high school offering excellent Judaic and General Studies programs.

C.H.A.T. students are drawn from a wide range of backgrounds. Some are from public schools, and we provide them with a specially designed curriculum in Hebrew language and Judaica.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

UJA Federation president focuses on community unity

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

The overriding objective of his term of office will be the unity of the Toronto Jewish community, says Joseph Steiner, the new president of UJA Federation.

"Relations between various streams of religious observance is an issue that won't disappear no matter what the decision on conversions is in the Knesset," he said.

As the president of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE), and in his work for UJA Federation, Steiner said he has seen cooperation across the full religious spectrum to achieve common goals.

A second major objective of his term, the 50-year-old lawyer said, is to implement the recommendations of the Commission on Jewish Education, particularly as they apply to day schools and supplementary schools.

Subcommittees of UJA Federation and the BJE are working on the commission's report, and Steiner expects a report by next summer on the whole question of financial support for Jewish schools.

He doubts whether the report will mean any new financial aid for parents of children attending these schools. "I cannot see a larger proportion of the campaign funds going for this purpose without impacting on other programs. Education already takes up 50 percent of the local budget. There may be ways of making the same money go further."

The son of the late former Labor Zionist leader, Harry Steiner, and Ruth Steiner, the new UJA Federation head takes over at a significant moment in the agency's history. It is embarking for the first time on a $150-million endowment and capital legacy campaign aimed at large givers, to guarantee that the human needs of a mushrooming Jewish community will be met.

For example, it includes a $50-million capital program that would ensure the building of a new campus of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) next to the Bathurst Jewish Centre to replace the old and overcrowded quarters on Wilmington Avenue.

Other major items to be financed under this program would be badly-needed renovations to the Bathurst Jewish Centre and a new Jewish Community Centre in York Region, probably in Thornhill, to serve the fast-growing Jewish population there.

Approximately 170,000 Greater Toronto area Jews rely on a communal infrastructure built for 100,000.

Three-quarters of the $100 million designated for the Endowment Fund will be set aside for unrestricted use, permitting UJA Federation to act quickly when a crisis arises. The remainder will be for restricted use attached to programs defined by the donor in consultation with UJA Federation.

Steiner said the last UJA Federation campaign raised $35.5 million and it is hoped to increase this to $50 million by the year 2000.

"Of course progress to this goal depends on the economy and the way the campaigns go."

Although the money raised in the last campaign went 54 percent for local purposes and 46 percent for Israel, because of unusual needs locally and government cutbacks to social services, the new president thinks a 50-50 split is appropriate.

"We didn't move easily away from the 50-50 split and we want to get back to it. Of course a lot depends on how much we raise. We are doing better than a lot of federations in the United States."

JCS network benefits Jewish students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In the two years since its creation, Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto has built a city-wide network to benefit Jewish students at York University, the University of Toronto, Ryerson Polytechnic University and Seneca College.

As the umbrella organization for pre-existing Jewish student groups at individual Toronto campuses, JCS began to turn the entire city into its campus – creating inter-campus links, organizing off-campus events in recognition of the overwhelming number of Toronto students still living at home, and forging ties with some three dozen "partner organizations."

Zac Kaye, a longtime Jewish community professional and former Hillel director in Australia and Vancouver, was hired by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (now UJA Federation) in 1995 to spearhead the project as executive director of the agency.

In an era of budgetary restraint, the campus was one of the few Federation beneficiaries to receive a budget increase.

Its annual allocation has stayed constant at just over $400,000, an increase of $140,000 over the 1994-95 year – a relatively small per capita amount, one which UJA Federation executive director Allan Reitzes said the federation hopes to ultimately increase.

With an estimated 15,000 Jewish students at Toronto campuses, the allocation works out to not quite $27 per student per year. When Kaye worked in Vancouver, he said, a budget of $250,000 served 1,200 Jewish students – a whopping $208 per student per year.

To make up the shortfall between its allocation and its operating budget of $450,000, JCS has had to become "more creative," said Kaye. The organization has done some fundraising and obtained grants from Hillel International, for example, to fund leadership training (one of the agency's priorities) and a variety of other programs.

"The federation realized there was a strong connection between Jewish continuity and the campus," said Kaye. "People realized if they were investing in day school education, it didn't end there.

Although the Toronto campuses already had individual Jewish student organizations, the lack of a cohesive structure was seen as problematic.

When Kaye arrived in Toronto, he found the campus situation worse than he expected, he said. "We weren't building for the future. There was a lot of disaffection and disinterest. There had been a lot of turmoil at York. There was a lack of cohesion."

"You maximize the resources you have by bringing them together in one organization," said Reitzes. "Each campus [now] has staff that are dedicated to them and that look beyond the individual campus. The idea is to have the best of both worlds."

York's Jewish Student Federation director Pearl Gropper Berman, who now also serves as staff person for Seneca Hillel, was hired about six months before the central agency was created.

"It was very isolating," she said. "I felt I didn't have a community of professionals to rely on. I've seen a huge transition. I think Jewish Campus Services developed the idea that the city is our campus."

JCS staff meet weekly to share ideas and plan together. Other full-time staff members include Lance Davis, director of U of T's Hillel-JSU, Stephanie Wener, who oversees Ryerson Hillel and also works with the U of T group, and Rabbi Michael Skobac, city-wide campus chaplain.

"Our job," said Kaye, "is to provoke [a] sense of Jewish pride." Much of JCS's work involves "engaging" uninvolved students by providing "multiple opportunities for connection." A workshop on eating disorders held at York earlier this year was one example.

Next March, JCS plans to run an arts festival for which students will be invited to submit photos, paintings, sculptures and videos reflecting Jewish themes.

"We hope that will provoke a lot of interest and involvement, hopefully from people who wouldn't necessarily get involved with us," Kaye said.

From a religious point of view, JCS strongly promotes Jewish pluralism, observing kashrut at all its programs (so as not to exclude anyone) and offering a range of denominational services at events like Shabbatonim. "We've worked hard to create a community and build a sense of mutual respect," said Kaye. "We have made a very clear statement in the community that we're a pluralistic agency."

Among JCS's partner organizations represented at this year's annual awards night for student volunteers, were Aish HaTorah, Koach (a campus offshoot of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism) and Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. "We're not an agency seeking to bring people closer to any path of Judaism," said Kaye.

A new avenue of service for the agency is to meet the needs of parents, he noted, adding that before the academic year begins, JCS regularly receives about six or seven calls a week from Jewish parents. A series of parent workshops is being planned for the fall.

Other initiatives currently under way include a career mentoring project and the building of a database of alumni of the groups falling under JCS's aegis.

Long-term health care needs remain a major concern

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

The need for beds in chronic care hospitals and nursing homes, and immediate care for heart attack patients are still a concern along north Bathurst Street, despite the fact that Branson Hospital will be converted to an ambulatory care centre by the end of 1999.

"We have 40 to 50 patients every day who are waiting for a place for long-tem care," said Branson president Jack Gallop.

A proposal by Branson to convert some of its acute beds to long-term care was turned down by the Ontario Health Services Restructuring Commission (OHSRC).

As for the fear expressed by North York Mayor Mel Lastman that heart attack victims will die in the extra 10 to 12 minutes it takes for them to get to another hospital, Gallop said it is of serious concern to the hospitals too.

"Part of the answer will be in our new walk-in medical facility where we can stabilize and resuscitate these patients," he said.

Branson is still considering appealing the commission's decision which is not final, not to allow long-term beds at the hospital.

The problem is aggravated by the OHSRC's decision to close down five chronic care hospitals in the Metro area.

Inauguration of Baycrest Home Care Service is one way the challenge of a shortage of long-term care is being met.

"This is fundamental to the desire of more and more people to remain in their own homes," a hospital spokesperson said.

There is a waiting list of 769 for the Baycrest Home for the Aged and the home has set up a Seniors Support Service for urgent cases.

An infusion of $250,000 from the Ontario Ministry of Health to Senior Care (Communiy Services to Jewish Elderly), as reported in the Aug. 14 CJN, will significantly expand respite care, transportation and support for people looking after those with chronic or terminal illnesses, or with early or mild dementia. The expansion begins immediately and will be phased in during the next few months.

"The whole homemaking service is being revolutionized in line with changes in society," said Senior Care coordinator Michael Scheinert.

This is one response to the problems caused for Jewish seniors by the cuts to social services instituted by governments.

Help is also on the way for those tied hand and foot to looking after a sick spouse or relative.

Volunteers are being sought by the Bernard Betel Centre to give these caregivers a respite for one to three hours, once a week or even more often. The volunteers will be paid transportation costs, but the service will be free to the caregiver.

Funded by a grant from the Ministry of Health, the program hopes to help 70 caregivers in a year with 1,450 hours of service.

Volunteers can be teams of two friends, or a grandmother with a grandchild, according to coordinator Paula Mintzberg.

Homemaking service is being revolutionized

The over-55 volunteers, must be checked out by Metro Police, which may take from four to eight weeks.

Those looking after people with strokes, Parkinson's disease or early Alzheimer's will be among those given respite care. Although no medical or nursing care will be given, it does not rule out clients needing toiletting or diaper change if this can be done before or after the volunteer is on hand. No meals need be given by the volunteers.

Both men and women are needed and having a car is not a prerequisite. Information on medical conditions facing the volunteers will be given by Mintzberg, a registered nurse.

For information, call 225-2112.

For the first time, Bernard Betel Centre is combining with Senior Care to operate a program to drive people to doctors or dentists, or to hospital or shopping. In some cases, an escort will be provided with the driver if required.

"We're looking for drivers beginning immediately to perform this mitzvah," said Barbara Zigler, volunteer services coordinator at 225-2112.

The Betel Centre is continuing its work in preventing abuse to elders through the Awareness Players and other means. The fame of the Awareness Players and their skits have spread far and wide and in August the cast will visit the Temiskaming First Native Reserve in Quebec.

There's more to JNF than just blue boxes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

There's more to the Jewish National Fund (JNF) than tree-planting certificates and blue-and-white Keren Kayemet boxes, although those are certainly the most familiar symbols of the organization.

JNF's initial mandate was to reclaim the land of Israel, much of which was purchased in trust for the Jewish people in the early part of the century, explained Ben Prossin, executive director, Ontario region.

In recent years, JNF has branched out to provide infrastructure, including tens of thousands of housing units and over 8,000 kilometres of roads, for a growing Israeli population. Over the past decade JNF has also undertaken the building of dams and reservoirs in Israel to stave off water shortages.

The organization was founded at the 1901 Zionist Congress in Switzerland, and a Canadian presence was established shortly thereafter, said Prossin.

Here in Toronto, he oversees a staff of nine people, including an Israeli shaliach, Yaen Vered, who recently replaced Doron Kadmiel on the latter's return to Israel.

A large volunteer contingent, however, is crucial to the success of much of JNF's work. There are close to 100 JNF board members, and the organization's annual Negev dinner – its major fundraiser, usually attended by about 1,000 people – generally involves 100 to 200 volunteers. Tom Ungar, president of JNF Toronto, is also national secretary of JNF Canada.

Prossin noted that while Canada has a dozen JNF offices across the country, including national headquarters in Montreal, there are many more communities with a JNF presence. Two framed tree certificates he purchased as a youngster in Glace Bay, N.S., attest to that statement. "Where there is a significant Jewish population, you usually find JNF," he said.

The organization can be found in far-flung locales like England, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, South America, the former Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Hungary "and of course Israel," said Prossin.

The American operation, plagued by controversy last year over fiscal mismanagement, is completely separate from JNF Canada, stressed Prossin.

"We're like spokes on a wheel, and the centre is Jerusalem. In Canada over 80 percent of the funds we raise goes to Israel. That's quite a high percentage and we're quite proud of that."

With Israel's 50th anniversary less than a year away, JNF Canada's current priority is an international project called the Jubilee Forest, located between Beersheva and Arad, next to Israel's Toronto community forest in the Negev, an area on which JNF is focusing major efforts.

Marla Dadoun, co-chair, community Tu b'Shvat celebration, holds a mike for a BBYO member at symbolic planting ceremony. [JNF photo]

"We're going to ask every Canadian to plant the Jubilee Forest," said Prossin.

In addition, JNF's annual MEGA tour next September will celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary. Locally, JNF is on the steering committee of the consortium of Jewish community organizations coordinating events during Israel's 50th anniversary year.

Since 1948, JNF worldwide has planted over 200 million trees in Israel. As a result, Israel will be the only country in the world to have more trees at the end of this century than at the beginning, said Prossin.

The Shachamon 6 neighborhood in Eilat – parks, playgrounds, synagogues and schools – was a project of JNF Canada "and particularly Toronto," noted Prossin. The project was a beneficiary of funds raised at the 1990 and 1991 Negev dinners.

This year's Negev dinner will honor Edward Bronfman. Other annual activities, like the tree campaign, centre around Tu b'Shvat, the new year of the trees. Recent years have seen an increased JNF presence at Jewish schools, with the shaliach visiting to teach students about the significance of JNF's work.

This year JNF launched a community Tu b'Shvat festival, held at the Promenade shopping centre in Thornhill, with entertainment and games for children. It's scheduled to run again this coming year.

"Our role is reclaiming the land and protecting the environment. We strive to ensure an excellent quality of life for all of the people of Israel," said Prossin. "By the way, do you have a blue box at home?"

Canadian friends helps groups

Canadian friends of Israeli institutions work here to raise funds and keep Canadians informed. A sample of such organizations includes:

Canadian Friends of Jerusalem Elwyn was organized in 1988 to support Jerusalem Elwyn in its enrichment of existing programs and the creation of additional innovative programs for children and adults with development disabilities. Fundraising through its holiday cards and a cooking demonstration has been earmarked for such things as a packaging and folding machine for Elwyn's direct mail division, which employs disabled clients.

The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science is committed to helping the Weizmann Institute maintain its standards of excellence and its significant contributions to world science. Funds raised are used to build and maintain scientific facilities, acquire up-to-date research equipment and instrumentation, set up endowments for research centres and establish professional chairs and scholarships.

Canadian friends of Givat Haviva supports one of the oldest and largest institutions in Israel. Canadian friends groups provide info, raise funds with troubled adolescents and challenged youth. Canadian Friends raises funds through special occasion cards. It puts out a newsletter several times a year and brings in speakers here during Holocaust Education Week.

Canadian Friends of Peace Now aims at rallying support for a just and secure peace for Israel. The organization sponsors speakers, and recently held a peace concert at Holy Blossom Temple featuring the Flying Bulger Klezmer Band. Money is raised through direct solicitation.

With offices in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver, Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, is the fundraising and public relations arm of the university. The organzation sponsors special events and lectures and sells commemorative cards. Last March, the Toronto chapter, in celebration of its 18th anniversary, joined Beth Tikvah Synagogue, which celebrated its 30th anniversary, and presented a concert featuring Chava Alberstein. The New Ben-Gurion Associates, Toronto's leadership group, is organizing a theatre evening to see Rent, on Nov. 27.

Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University sponsors lectures, and organizes student programs in Israel for one year, one semester or a summer. It is holding its third annual North American conference in Toronto – the first time it will be in Canada – from Sept. 18 to 21. Speakers include Norman Spector, publisher of the Jerusalem Post and Yoram Dinstein, president and chair of the international board of governors.

Volunteers at the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, part of Yad Vashem in Israel help research names, assist in mailings and take part in fundraising activities. On Nov. 5, a dinner honoring the Righteous Among the Nations will feature keynote speaker Mike Harris. Volunteers are needed to sell tickets for that event. The society is presently setting up a resource centre for young adults.

A preview of the film, The Long Way Home, is being screened by Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre on Sept. 24. The film, which contrasts survivors' difficulties in reaching Palestine with the ease with which war criminals found refuge in Canada and around the world, won an award at the Sundance Film Festival. Money raised from the screening will go towards the Canadian Friends' budget. Sol Littman of the Toronto office will address the Ukraine Canadian Association in Winnipeg in October. "This is a watershed invitation by a Ukranian organzation to one that is avidly in search of war criminals," says Littman.

Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem helps support the school which has 1,000 students, most of whom live on campus. A recent fundraiser was held at the home of Lesley Dan, who was honored for his philanthropic work in Toronto.

A tribute to Israel's soldiers was held recently by the Association for the Soldiers of Israel (ASI). All funds went to the Canadian Zionist Cultural Association (CZCA), which provides scholarships for men and women who have completed their military service and want to pursue studies at university or college. Funds raised by ASI have gone towards sponsoring the "Toronto House," a dormitory building used by thousands of Israeli soldiers each year. Among other things, the organization plans to outfit five missile boats with TV sets and VCRs, provide a mobile gym and fitness room for an armored brigade based on the Golan, and refurnish the lobby at the Soldiers Centre in Beersheva.

Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel has recently moved its Toronto offices and Col. Ilan Egozi, executive director of Beit Halochem in Israel, will be here this fall for the office dedication. He is planning to travel to Montreal and Ottawa and will conduct parlor meetings to raise funds for the organization. In June, the office sponsored a concert featuring Theodore Bikel.

Canadian Friends of Ezrath-Nashim Herzog Hospital conduct fundraising activities, including an afternoon of tea and music, for Israel's first geriatric-psychiatric hospital. Toronto's connection to Ezrath Nashim is through the Silver-Cooper Geriatric Rehabilitation Centre, which provides physiotherapy and occupational therapy treatment for inpatients and outpatients, and the Albert and Temmy Latner Institute for research in social psychiatry and psychotherapy.

Canadian Friends of Canada-Israel Children's Centres aids the 12 centres in Israel that offer tennis and other sports to children from various social and economic backgrounds. Canadian friends' events include an annual golf tournament and a summer Sunday brunch with four or five children from Israel and their coach and supervision. In June, Leah Rabin, who along with her husband, was involved with the centres, was a special guest.

The Toronto Chapter of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel, founded three years ago, raises funds for medical equipment and ambulances.

The organization raises money here and purchases items including stretchers, medical supplies and blood extraction units, as well as ambulances, and sends the items to Israel.

Funds are raised by personal approach, four mailings a year, bus trips to casinos, bridge nights and card games. Plans for the spring include a twilight cruise in Toronto harbor and a golf tournament.

Reena gets set to open new centre

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Reena's new home, the 45,000 square foot Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre on Clark Avenue West in Thornhill, opens officially this month with a host of new programs and activities.

Reena, established in 1973 by parents of children with developmental disabilities, provides such services as group homes, day and evening programs, group and individual therapy, student training and community consultation.

The new centre is a fully accessible day facility which offers a wellness and health centre, gymnasium, creative arts workshop, computer centre and library, with activities tailored to individual skills and interests of its members. A horticultural centre will provide a therapeutic atmosphere for members to learn about growing plants.

Executive director Sandy Keshen says the wellness centre, which focuses on the special health care needs of people with developmental disabilities, will provide health classes on such topics as nutrition, hygiene, sexuality, stress management, exercise and other general health care issues.

The centre will include a medication/medical treatment room, a medical examining room, a rehabilitation area with equipment for occupational therapy and physiotherapy and space for counselling and assessment for speech and behavior therapy.

The wellness centre will also concentrate on both outreach to isolated families with health care needs and establishing linkages to the medical research community. "The professionals of our multidisciplinary team will work with researchers in different settings, such as the Hospital for Sick Children, Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Centre and University of Toronto," says Keshen.

Keshen says Reena's goal is to make the new Battle Centre a "bright, airy, welcoming place where people feel welcome and good about themselves. We see our clients as valued people and we want them to see themselves that way."

Planned programs for the fall include a support group for adults with autism, Judaic awareness classes, computer/journalism club, art therapy, indoor sports, relationship building and drama. Pre-registration is required for all courses.

Arlene Margolese, Reena's volunteer coordinator, says the centre depends on volunteers and always has openings for people who want to lend a hand. "Volunteers can help out in the horticultural centre, in literacy training, lifeskill training and in the gym."

Reena also needs "PALunteers" to work one-on-one with clients; home visitors; or drivers who can accompany clients to appointments.

Lewis, an active centre member, enjoys working in the greenhouse and watching the fruits of his labor. [Photo courtesy Reena]

COMMUNITY FOCUS

New community facilities reflect religious diversity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

New facilities are being added to existing ones in and around Toronto to meet the religious and spiritual needs of a booming Jewish community.

Reflecting the diversity of the community, there are numerous synagogues, temples and educational facilities which fulfil the broad spectrum of religious observance from the most pious to the very secular.

The Bathurst Street corridor remains the magnet for the greatest number of religious and cultural facilities. From the downtown core, the community spreads northward with more than 120 synagogues and temples accommodating members of the three major branches of Judaism as well as egalitarian, Reconstructionist, humanist, gay and lesbian, and others.

Day schools and other Hebrew educational facilities, social service agencies, mikvot, organized kashrut supervision, burial facilities and a plethora of organized programs make Toronto one of the best served North American Jewish communities.

With a large influx of Jews from around the world, established organizations are expanding their programs and new facilities are being created to accommodate those who have settled here.

Jewish Information Service (JIS) keeps up-to-date records of the synagogues, temples, schools, organizations and programs available in the area.

Although services in many temples and synagogues are for members only, JIS prepares a list of religious facilities that provide services for those who are not affiliated with a religious institution. Throughout the city, religious services are also conducted at schools, community centres, social service agencies and temporary locations.

There are 12 Reform congregations in the Greater Toronto area. Holy Blossom Temple, which was the first established in Toronto, is the largest, with more than 2,500 families.

As well, smaller groups include a Reform service at Baycrest Terrace, the Downtown Reform Minyan and Temple Kol Ami. There are also Reform congregations in Durham Region (Pickering, Ajax, Whitby), Bramalea (Brampton, Bolton, Malton, Georgetown), Newmarket, Oakville and Mississauga.

Beth Tzedec Synagogue, which has 2,700 families, is the largest of a dozen Conservative congregations in Toronto, Downsview, Thornhill and Willowdale. In addition, Beit Rayim is located in Richmond Hill.

There are more than 80 Orthodox congregations and minyanim in the Greater Toronto Area. Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue is the largest Orthodox congregation with 1,200 members. Along with the established synagogues, Orthodox services are held in many venues, including Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Baycrest Centre and Baycrest Terrace synagogues, Netivot Hatorah Day School, Bloor JCC Chapel, Kol Torah Sephardic Centre and Synagogue at Promenade Circle, Ner Israel Yeshiva, the Reichmann Minyan at First Canadian Place, the Riverdale Community, and a Sephardi Iraqi congregation at the Bernard Betel Centre.

There are also some 20 congregations listed by JIS as "others," which include Beth Hazicharon with services in Hungarian and Hebrew; Bina Congregation formed by Jews of Indian descent; Darchei Noam Congregation, a Reconstructionist synagogue; First Narayever, an egalitarian traditional congregation; Kehillat Ahavat Hesed, egalitarian; Keshet Shalom for the gay and lesbian community; Lincoln Place Nursing Home Chapel; Mount Sinai Hospital; and Shir Libeynu, a progressive egalitarian congregation.

There are 14 mohalim representing every branch of Judaism who perform brit milah (ritual circumcision). There is one female mohel.

Four facilities provide chapel and funeral arrangements: Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, Hebrew Basic Burial, Simple Alternative and Steeles-College Memorial Chapel.

The Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of the Kashrut Council of Toronto-COR supervises and certifies thousands of retail and commercial products, catering establishments, hotels, and social service facilities.

It also publishes retail and commercial kashrut directories and provides kashrut educational programs and a cooking school. All COR programs are open to the entire community and there is no charge to be on their mailing list.

For those who follow the laws of taharat hamishpachah (family purity), there are 14 mikvot located throughout the city, an increase of four since last year.

For more information on the religious and educational facilities and High Holy Day services in and around Toronto, call the Jewish Information Service, 416-635-5600 or the UJA/Federation Web site, [www.feduja.org].

Groups seek volunteers

People are needed for all purposes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

In addition to helping service organizations run smoothly, volunteers have the added bonus of improving their own skills and staying involved with the Jewish community.

Some organizations in our community that are seeking volunteers include:

ORT Canada (787-0339) seeks volunteers who have skills and knowledge in communications and public relations, education or special events. People are also needed to help out in the office on a regular basis.

Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living (225-2112) has established a respite care program to address the well-being of senior caregivers in the community, where volunteers give caregivers a much needed break. Individuals can volunteer with a friend or alone to spend time with someone who needs companionship. These one to three hour visits are arranged on a regular or occasional basis. No nursing or physical care is involved but training and ongoing support is provided for volunteers. Transportation costs are reimbursed. Call Paula Mintzberg.

Joan Stevens, coordinator of volunteer services at the Jewish Family & Child Service (638-7800), says the agency always needs tutors and big brothers and sisters. The big brother or sister program, which involves youth aged six to 16, requires a minimum commitment of one year. Applicants are screened and orientation is provided.

Chaplaincy visitors to Jewish residents of hospitals and nursing homes are needed. Visits can be weekly, monthly or during holiday times. The agency also requires eight to 10 volunteers with good telephone skills for administrative work.

Senior Care (635-2860) needs volunteers for its kosher meals on wheels program. Participants must have a car and can work as many mornings as they wish. Volunteer visitors are needed to drop in on homebound seniors and phone pals are needed to telephone seniors on a daily, weekly or short-term basis. A new joint program with Bernard Betel Centre seeks drivers to accompany seniors to medical appointments and take them to Bernard Betel Centre.

Baycrest Centre (785-2500, ext. 2572) has a summer program for youth who volunteer in a wide range of programs, including outings, friendly visiting and creative arts. Hours are flexible and training is provided. Volunteers are also needed to help run music, exercise and art classes or to lead discussion groups.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

Landsmanshaften provided a 'home' for immigrants

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As Jews from Eastern European countries began to settle in Toronto and other urban areas, they formed landsmanshaften, groups of individuals from the same area or shtetl.

Along with the friendships, camaraderie and the social aspects of the landsmanshaft, these societies fulfilled many other needs of the immigrants. They arranged for funerals and purchased burial grounds, provided loans and sick benefits, established synagogues, and created networks of like-minded people.

For many of its members, the groups created a link for them to their former communities and a place to memorialize their loved ones.

As survivors of the Holocaust arrived, they were welcomed by the members of the societies who could relate to them and who could help them keep alive the memories of their once vibrant cities and towns. And many shared a common language – Yiddish.

Many of the landsmanshaft groups still exist – among them Apter, Chenstochover, Chmeilnick, Driltzer, Ivansker, Keltzer, Lagover, Linitzer, Lipsker, Lodzer, Lubin, Maramoresher, Ostrovtzer, Piotrkov-Tomashov-Belchatow, Pultusker, Radom, Shedlitz Lukower, Shedlover, Stashiver, Stopnitzer, Tzosmerer, Warshaver, Wierzbniker, Zaglembier – and others from Poland, Lithuania, Hungary, Russia and other communities devastated by the Holocaust.

Many societies formed women's auxiliaries and sisterhoods that have been very active parts of the landsmanshaften. Women of the Apter, Chenstochover, Chmeilnicker, Massada chapter, Lodzer, Stashiver, Stopnitzer, Warshaver and others work tirelessly to raise money for local and Israeli charities.

Today, many of the members of the societies are retired seniors who have attempted to involve their children and grandchildren without much success.

Jack Stopper, 89, has been a member of the Driltzer Young Men's Society for more than 60 years. In 1934, he was asked by the members of Anshe Driltz, many in their 70s and 80s, to form a group for younger members.

Younger members

The Driltzer Young Men's Society has 80 members. Although Stopper's daughters Ruthie Greenberg and Rochelle Sufrin are members and attend some of the functions, like others of the second and third generations, they do not take an active role in the organization.

Stopper explains that the members meet on Sunday mornings for davening at the building they own on Wilson Avenue. They conduct services on the High Holy Days and hold meetings every two weeks. He adds that although they are trying to keep the society operating, many of their members have died and it is becoming more and more difficult for their aging members.

Like many of the landsmanshaften, a major role for their members is fundraising. Stopper says they contribute to Israeli soldiers, the Baycrest Centre and the United Jewish Appeal. Although their membership is $50 a year, they receive rental from their building and they hold fundraising events.

"It is my hope that the third generation will take over and continue to do good work and keep the good name of Driltz," he says.

Mike Rosenberg, co-chair of the Society Division Cabinet of UJA, believes that the phenomenon of landsmanshaften of the 20th century, "which were formed to help them find comfort from each other will disappear in the next decade or two."

A Holocaust survivor who came from Szydlowiec, Rosenberg was told shortly after he arrived in Canada in 1948 that "you must belong somewhere."As there was no society from his small town in Poland, he joined the Wierzbniker Friendly Society where his friend's wife comes from, primarily "to get clients for my printing business."

He praised the societies that hosted the Holocaust survivors for a short time until "they could create ties with others who had similar histories." He says that the children of survivors have entered the professions and as a consequence they have joined professional organizations and synagogues rather than join their parent's society.

"All of the mutual and sick benefits are going by the wayside and are no longer relevant," says Rosenberg. "With declining memberships," he adds, "it is only a question of time until these societies disappear."

Parents hope for day school in Bloor-Spadina area

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Parents with young children who live in the revitalized Bloor and Spadina Annex area have organized a group dedicated to establishing a Jewish day school in downtown Toronto.

Scheduled to open in the fall of 1998 with a senior kindergarten and grades 1 and 2, they plan to add an additional grade each year.

Currently, there is only evening and weekend Jewish education available in the downtown area.

Cynthia Lazar, a member of the organizing committee, says that she began thinking about the need for a downtown Jewish day school last year when her oldest child started a two-year nursery school program at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC).

Most day schools are located in the northern part of the city, with two below Eglinton. Lazar says that it is difficult to get children into these day schools, because they have to start at junior kindergarten or lose their places.

Lazar, a practising psychiatrist who has lived in the Annex for 15 years and works in the area says: "I want my children to have a Jewish education, to learn how to pray and to gain the wisdom of Jewish writing, but I couldn't bear the thought of sending my 4-year-old on a bus for two hours a day."

She spoke to other parents in the area with young children who were also interested in a day school education for their children and it became apparent that they had some of the same concerns.

Commuting, she says, is not their only concern. The committee, which includes families from a broad spectrum of Jewish practices and affiliations, stresses the importance of equality between men and women.

Cynthia Lazar

Modeled on Heschel schools

They agreed to model the day school on the Heschel schools of New York, Los Angeles and the recently established Heschel school in North York.

"We respect every child's practices from Orthodox to Reform," says Lazar. To accommodate the entire community, all the food served at the school will be kosher. The school, she adds, will be nurturing with small classes and an arts based program.

"The notion of community will play a central role in our curriculum. At the most basic level, children will attend school and make friends in their own neighborhood. On a broader level, they will see themselves as part of two communities – Jewish and secular. They will learn, as Abraham Heschel taught, to be responsible for social action in both communities."

She describes the parents as "a diverse group of high achievers."

The school, she emphasizes, will set rigorous academic standards.

"We recognize the need to give our kids a solid religious education found in a Jewish day school, but regret having to segregate our children to do so," she said.

If you are interested in more information about the downtown Jewish day school, call Lazar at 416-515-1477 or e-mail Gary Schwartz, [mycity@interlog.com].

UJA Federation sets up office in York Region

Will service estimated 44,000 Jews

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

York Region, the third largest and fastest growing Jewish community in Canada, now has its own UJA Federation office.

Located at 1118 Centre St. in Thornhill, close to Jewish institutions in the Bathurst and Clark area, the newly opened office — the first satellite office in UJA Federation's 80 year history — will provide service and support to the estimated 44,000 Jews in the region.

UJA Federation's York Region coordinator, a new position created earlier this year, works out of the Centre Street site, which also houses B'nai Brith Youth Organization, meeting rooms for outside groups and organizations, as well as a youth volunteer recruitment centre.

Thornhill resident Carole Sterling, a member of the continuity committee, said, "I'm personally very excited about the new office. Federation needs a presence to draw people... I'm aware of a lot of people who aren't affiliated."

She views the new office as the first step for York Region, she said. "It's a start. The hope is that with funding we'll be able to provide more support and programs for the community down the road."

Sterling said she would like to see the establishment of a Jewish community centre in Thornhill where people of all ages will be able to gather for a variety of activities including sports programs. "If I want a basketball program for my son, I have to enrol him in a local, non-Jewish centre or be prepared to shlep him a long distance."

Outreach to youth

Outreach to unaffiliated youth is an important function of the new satellite office, according to former York Region coordinator Saul Cohen, who has returned to university. (Ilan Meister assumed the coordinator position at the end of August.)

Cohen said the York Region Jewish community is comprised of many young families. More than one third, or roughly 15,000 residents, are under the age of 14.

One of the first tasks Cohen was assigned shortly after he was hired in January was to organize the February youth symposium which took place at Westminster Collegiate in Thornhill. The symposium was an opportunity for the 50 teenagers – affiliated and unaffiliated – representing many of the high schools in the region, to explore the needs of York Region's Jewish youth.

Cohen noted that one of the gaps in service identified was the lack of volunteer opportunities for youth in the region. He said the Centre Street office will have a teen volunteer recruitment centre manned by teen volunteers who will also be organizing a monthly social action program for unaffiliated youth in the area.

He described the recruitment centre as a clearing house for volunteer programs for youth, adding that volunteers will meet with organizations in the region to encourage them to create more volunteer opportunities.

He stressed that while youth activities are an important focus of the position, UJA Federation's York Region coordinator must provide service to residents of all ages and to that end Cohen met with people to guage the needs of the community as a whole.

"People need a way relate to and identify with the larger community. This is what the satellite office of UJA Federation represents," he said.

How it all started

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

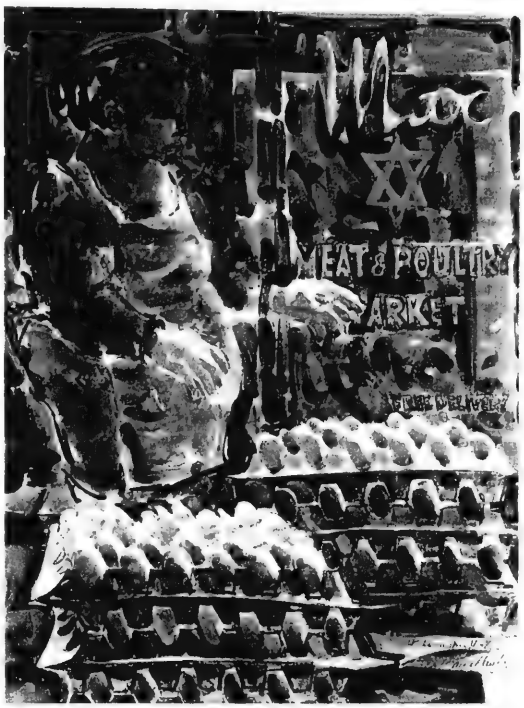
One of the important amenities that signals a Jewish community's coming of age is a strong, central body to regulate kashrut. Toronto is one such city, whose Kashruth Council of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, popularly known as COR, serves that function.

Kashrut in Toronto

But it was not always that way. In fact, so rancorous has the subject been over the years that at one time or another, various sectors of the community did not talk to each other, avoided eating food supervised by the "other" party or insisted on eating only salads at an institution or function whose kashrut was certified by the "other" side.

Acceptance within the community of COR supervision is almost universal. However, there are still disagreements from time to time about the decisions that COR makes. Not everyone is satisfied with the status quo.

In a three-part series, the first installment of which we publish today, CJN staff reporter Leila Speisman examines the history of kashrut regulation in greater Toronto, the mandate and operation of COR and some of the reasons why not everyone is satisfied with the status quo.



Max Meat and Poultry Market by Aba Bayefsky, watercolor on paper. From The Living City: Toronto Paintings from the 1940s to the 1990s.

Holy Blossom Congregation, the first synagogue established in Toronto, was originally Orthodox. In the 1850s and 60s, its members imported a shochet from Buffalo to provide them with kosher meat.

However, according to Stephen Speisman, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives and author of The Jews of Toronto; a history to 1937, the initiative of Holy Blossom members caused considerable problems for their neighbors to the south, for "when Toronto had kosher meat, Buffalo didn't."

Holy Blossom soon hired a congregational minister who was also a shochet, and arranged for a butcher at the St. Lawrence Market to keep a separate table and set of utensils for kosher meat. While anyone could purchase the meat, Holy Blossom members had first choice of cuts.

When the Jewish population of Toronto grew in the years before World War II, some attempts were made to have a universal kashrut system, but it worked only sporadically and eventually broke down.

Speisman explained that people operated on the principle that they shopped at a butcher or a baker whom they knew and trusted. Still, he said, there was a great deal of fraud, with non-kosher meat being advertised as kosher. The reliability of the supervision of kashrut was tainted by the considerable conflicts of interest that abounded in the attempt to administer the rules of kashrut.

This chaotic situation could not continue, so in the late 1940s, the community finally took appropriate steps to deal with it.

Meyer Gasner, an active communal leader until his death in 1974, took the initiative. He became the founding chair of the Division of Orthodox Synagogue of Canadian Jewish Congress, Central Division. Under his leadership, rabbis, community leaders and representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress joined to establish a body to supervise kashrut.

Fake advertising

In a report he presented to the community, Gasner charged that as much as 50 percent of poultry sold in Toronto as kosher, was not. He also charged that some of the butchers who represented themselves as being kosher were actually selling non-kosher meat.

This situation involving false advertising was not remedied until the mid 1960s, when the federal government enacted legislation forbidding the fraudulent use of labeling, packaging, advertising or selling of kosher food.

By 1954, after much negotiation, the new Division of Orthodox Synagogues signed cooperation agreements with Rabbis David Ochs, Meyer Greenwald and Avraham Aron Price, all of whom had previously supervised kashrut for various institutions and businesses. Each agreed to accept the kashrut of places supervised by the others.

For over 30 years, Rabbi Gedaliah Felder, a world renowned talmudic scholar, was chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth, the body of rabbis that served as advisors and consultants to the Kashruth department of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Central Division, as it was then called. Rabbi Felder was widely respected and accepted throughout the Jewish community.

So too was Nachman Shemen, an ordained rabbi and scholar who was the executive director of the kashrut department for nearly 50 years.

Rabbis Felder and Shemen were succeeded at their deaths by Rabbi Yitzchak Kerzner and Rabbi Mordechai Levin, respectively.

The scope of what is now called the Kashruth Council has grown. It currently has assigned some 450 COR numbers, as well as an ever-growing number of restaurants, bakeries, butcher shops and institutions. A number is assigned to each company that is supervised, and all supervised products manufactured by that company carry the same number.

COR also publishes a guide to the products it supervises and offers an information service and cooking classes.

COMMUNITY FOCUS

What is kashrut anyways?

The following is a very brief, very sketchy, non-authoritative synopsis of the origins of the laws of kashrut.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For thousands of years, the dietary laws have been among the linchpins of Jewish life. Observance of kashrut has not only led to the creation of a unique cuisine, it has also colored our relations with the non-Jewish world – and often with other Jews as well.

Kashrut in Toronto

Many people think that the main purpose of the dietary laws is the promotion of healthy eating habits.While healthier eating may be one of the results of observing kashrut, that is in fact not its key purpose. The dietary laws fall under the biblical "legislative" category of a chok for which no stated reason is given in the Torah. They are observed, literally, because G-d has commanded it.

Laws concerning food appear early in the Bible. In Bereshit (Genesis), 1:29, G-d says to Adam "Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, on which is the fruit yielding seed; to you it shall be for food."

From this verse, the sages decided there is no restriction on what fruits or vegetables may be eaten.

The substance of the laws of kashrut are based mainly on passages in the books of Vayikra (Leviticus) and Devarim (Deuteronomy) .

Categories of Food

The list of the animals permitted to Jews for eating appears in Devarim 14: 4-6. It includes ox, sheep, goat, deer and bison. The passage further explains: "And every beast that parts the hoof, forming therefore two entirely cloven hoofs, and chews the cud among the beasts, that may you eat."

Both Vayikra and Devarim contain lists of birds that are forbidden food. All are described as " abominable." Some of the birds on the list are the eagle, vulture, buzzard, raven, gull, sparrow hawk, stork, heron and hawk. Basically, the birds that are forbidden are scavengers – birds which eat other live things.

The birds not forbidden are chicken, duck, goose, pigeon, squab and turkey although there are Jews, descendants of a certain rabbinical family, who do not eat turkey.

The permissible category of fish is described in Vayikra 11:9-12: "These shall you eat of all that are in the waters" whatever has fins and scales in the waters, in the seas and in the rivers. Rabbinic authorities explain this as fish with at least one fin and one easily removable scale.

It is absolutely forbidden to eat insects.

Processing of Food

The consumption of blood is also absolutely forbidden. This means that special processes to remove the blood must be applied after an animal is slaughtered. While the slaughtering (schechting) process removes most of the blood, it is necessary to deplete even the last drops in the food intended to be eaten. This is done in a number of ways: for example, by salting and soaking it, roasting it over an open flame, or broiling it, depending on the type of food being kashered.

The prohibition against eating blood is categorical. Vayikra 17:10-11 warns: "Whatever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eats any manner of blood, then I will set my face against that person that eats blood, and will cut him off from among his people. For the life of the flesh is in the blood." (My italics)

In larger communities, most kosher meat and poultry are sold already soaked and salted.

Animals, birds must be slaughtered by a trained shochet

Animals and birds must be slaughtered by a rigorously trained shochet, using knives so sharp that they kill the animal instantly and painlessly. The schochet examines each animal afterwards to make sure that there are no defects in any of the main organs, such as the brain, windpipe, esophagus, heart, lungs or intestines.

Jews do not eat the sciatic nerve of animals, even ones permissible for eating. The reason for this is Jacob's night-time struggle with an angel during his return trip to Canaan, as a result of which his thigh was left permanently injured (Bereshit 32:32). This generally means that the entire hind quarter is not used, although there are some who know how to remove the sciatic nerve.

It is common to see a certification of kashrut on meats called Glatt kosher. This is a more technically exact standard of kashrut, which disallows even many minor adhesions in the lungs and demands that the meat be kashered (soaked and salted) less than three days after slaughter.

Probably one of the most widely known and observed restrictions of kashrut is the prohibition against eating milk and meat products together. This is derived from the passages in Devarim 14:21 and in Shmot (Exodus) 23:19, that enjoin: "You shall not boil a kid in its mother's milk."

The production of milk does not require kashrut supervision in the United States and Canada, since government supervision of the production and processing of milk is very strict Nevertheless, some people prefer to use milk that is cholov yisroel; that is, milk bottled under Jewish supervision and which ensures that no foreign substances have been added to it, especially the milk of an unclean animal.

However the production of cheese must be supervised, because some manufacturers use non-kosher rennet to curdle the milk.

Because wine is used for sacramental purposes, special supervision is required in its manufacture as well. The requirement for special supervision also applies to foods made with wine or grape juice.

Jewish leaders meet Axworthy

'Deep anxiety' over terror attacks conveyed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Israel's security and the role Canada can play in improving it were the focus of a precedent-setting Sept. 8 meeting in Ottawa between the leaders of Canada's major Jewish organizations and Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy.

Axworthy spent a little over an hour with the heads of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF). Jewish organizations have met with previous external affairs ministers, but this was the first such group meeting with Axworthy.

The meeting's "dominant message" was to convey the "deep anxiety" felt by Canadian Jewry over recent terror attacks in Israel, said Rob Ritter, national executive director of the CIC, under whose auspices the meeting was held.

Ritter told The CJN in a telephone interview the message to the minister was that Canada should have a more proactive and visible role in the Mideast.

As well, Jewish leaders conveyed to Axworthy that "too much emphasis" has been placed on Israel in international forums, like the United Nations, and that too little emphasis is placed on the "obligation" of Palestinians to combat terror in Israel.

In July, national Jewish groups sharply criticized Canada for supporting a UN vote that condemned Israel for its Har Choma housing project in Jerusalem.

The delegation told Axworthy of the Canadian Jewish community's "upset" at the vote, Ritter said, and criticized Canada's explanation of its vote for not including any reference to Arab terror.

Canadian wins second Emmy

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — It was deja vu at the recent Emmy Awards ceremony when Associated Producers, a Toronto-based documentary film company, won for excellence in investigative journalism a second year in a row.

The Emmy, awarded for The Selling of Innocents, a film about the sexual exploitation of young girls in India, was presented at the 18th annual News and Documentary Awards in New York last week.

An elated Simcha Jacobovici, co-founder of Associated Producers, spoke with The CJN in a phone interview from Toronto the morning after a late-night victory celebration in Manhattan. "Not bad for an Orthodox kid from Riverdale," he joked.

"I'm very excited. The Emmy award in investigative journalism is one of the most coveted of all news awards...To be in the big leagues [with major U.S. networks] and walk away with the Emmy twice is beyond one's dreams."

The Selling of Innocents

He pointed out that last year, the company scored an unprecedented victory by being the first organization outside the American mainstream news establishment to win the "plum" of news awards.

The victory is "a David and Goliath story," because Associated Producers was pitted against U.S. networks like ABC, CNN and CBS, which have multi-million-dollar budgets, he said. "They have amazing resources. Then you're looking at a little production company that spent $275,000 (US). It's not David against Goliath. It's midget David."

He said The Selling of Innocents had a "fairy tale scenario, from a filmmaking point of view," because initially broadcasters considered the subject matter too obscure and rejected his proposal, and now the film has won four of the most prestigious television awards: the Emmy; the Gold Plaque, Chicago International Film Festival; the Gold Apple, National Education Media Network; and the Silver Nymph, 1997 Monte Carlo Television Festival.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Holy Blossom Foundation

TORONTO — The first synagogue-related foundation in Canada, established by Holy Blossom Temple, was recently approved by the federal and provincial governments.

The founding chair of the foundation is Wendy Eisen and the vice-chair is Hershell Ezrin. Funds raised through the foundation will be used for the 60-year-old building and to enhance educational, worship and communal activities, Eisen said.

Rabbi Leaves London

LONDON, Ont. — The London Jewish community said goodbye to Rabbi David Rosenberg, this past summer.

Rabbi Rosenberg, who served as spiritual leader of Beth Tefilah Synagogue, left London to become Hillel director at the University of Chicago.

Also in London, Hillel Boroditsky recently assumed the position of executive director of the London Jewish Federation.

Born in Winnipeg, Boroditsky was an associate campaign director with the Montreal Combined Jewish Appeal for seven years and then spent four years as executive director of the Edmonton Jewish Federation.

New Federation President

EDMONTON — Steven Mandel was recently elected as president of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton.

Originally from Windsor, Ont., Mandel has lived in Edmonton for 24 years.

Helping Mazon Canada

TORONTO — A "lounge night" at the Taboo Wine Bar and Grill on Yonge Street is the first in a series of promotions aimed at benefiting Mazon Canada while fostering "commuter campus culture" at York University.

Mingle Productions, a project of Elliott and Sandy Hurst, is planning a number of the theme-oriented evenings.

The Hursts, who attended York University, said the first event scheduled for Sept. 27 is co-presented by CHRY 105.5 FM, the campus radio station. Mazon Canada was chosen as a beneficiary of the funds raised because "hunger and poverty are a reality for 2.5 million Canadians. Also, Mazon is looking to increase its exposure in the 19 to 28 age segment," said Elliott Hurst.

ISRAEL

Training Accident

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli air force pilots were hurt, one seriously, in a training accident with an F-16 fighter jet in southern Israel.

The pilots, an instructor and student, were on a training flight when a malfunction occurred, possibly because a bird flew into an engine.

The two bailed out, sustaining their injuries when they landed among cliffs near Mitzpe Ramon in the Negev.

Daylight Saving Ends

JERUSALEM — Daylight saving time ended in Israel on Saturday night. There is now a six-hour time difference between Israel and Eastern Daylight Time.

Unemployment Rising

JERUSALEM — Unemployment in Israel has reached its highest rate in three years with the development towns in the periphery being most affected. In Netivot, unemployment is running at 11.6 percent, double the rate of a year ago.

At the same time, Israel's growth rate has dropped to 2.5 percent, from six percent three years ago.

British Jews Mourn Princess Diana

LONDON — In what is being called "an unprecedented gesture of tribute," Britain's Jews joined their countrymen – and the world – in paying respects to Princess Diana.

Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, who declined to attend Diana's semi-state funeral service because it occurred on Shabbat, instructed all members of the Orthodox United Synagogue, the country's main synagogue body, to "join in the national mood of remembrance," his office said.

He also wrote a prayer for her, which began: "Almighty God, we come before You today, sharing in the grief of the British people and the world, at the untimely and sudden death of Diana, Princess of Wales."

It was recited in synagogues when the funeral ceremony for Diana started at Westminster Abbey on Saturday morning. Sermons were dedicated to her memory and synagogues observed a national silence at the end of the Abbey service.

Dayan calls for end to occupation

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A fiery speech by Labor MK Yael Dayan, daughter of the late Moshe Dayan, sparked cheers and jeers from audience members on different sides of the political divide.

A strong proponent of peace, Dayan told some 400 people at Holy Blossom Temple last week that Israel must end its occupation of the West Bank and adopt a more conciliatory policy towards Yasser Arafat and the Palestinians.

Palestinians in the West Bank have "natural rights to their own land" and deserve to be treated with dignity, she said. "How can we think of depriving others of what we want for ourselves?"

Not one to mince words, Dayan castigated the Likud government for perpetuating Israel's "immoral occupation" of the West Bank. "It does not adhere to any value system Jews believe in."

Israel should be a model of tolerance, she added.

"Jews can make a contribution to the world because we have paid a price. We should be tolerant and understanding and not inflict suffering on others."

Humiliating Palestinians by confiscating and bulldozing their property strips them of their motivation to support the peace process and fight Hamas, and increases their susceptibly to extremist influences, she charged.

Israel should be supporting Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who is "under pressure from all sides" and not make the "end of terrorism a precondition for peace," Dayan said.

"We are weakening him. His power is limited. He cannot pay for Hamas' acts [of terror]. It [weakening Arafat] lowers the degree to which he can combat terrorism" and reduces his means "to inject hope into his people.

"When Arafat is weak, we are losing. Peace is a win-win situation...Arafat can only be strong with Israeli and American support."

Palestinians deserve "a viable piece of land" and to achieve this, Israel must be prepared to give up many of its settlements, she said.

The majority of Jews have not flocked to the West Bank because they "don't want to live in someone else's home," she noted. "We [Israelis] want to live. We don't want to die for Hebron."

Dayan accused Prime Minister Benjamin Natanyahu of killing the peace process with his hardline policy and reneging on his 1996 campaign promise to proceed with the Oslo Accord, which is supported by 75 percent of Israelis.

She said the majority of Israelis want peaceful coexistence with their neighbors and recognize there's a cost to peace. Exchanging land for peace is a price worth paying to improve the country's moral fabric and quality of life, she added.

Siyum Hashas of Daf Yomi expected to draw about 5,000

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Up to 5,000 people are expected to attend the 10th Siyum Hashas of Daf Yomi at the Metro Convention Centre on Sept. 28 at 6 p.m.

They will join an estimated 70,000 Jews in 35 cities across the United States and Canada marking the event. The program will include a satellite hookup with the gathering at Madison Square Gardens in New York City, where every seat was sold out within three days of going on sale, and with Nassau Coliseum in Los Angeles.

The guest speaker in Toronto will be Rabbi Aaron Dovid Dunner, from London, England.

The Daf Yomi program was initiated in 1923 by Rabbi Meir Shapiro, the rabbi of Lublin, in Poland. Participants undertake to study the entire Talmud, one page a day, in a 7½-year cycle. Everyone in the program, wherever they are in the world, studies the same page on the same day.

The first Daf Yomi Siyum Hashas took place in Lublin at Yeshiva Chachmei Lublin on Feb. 2, 1931. The last one, the ninth, was based in New York and was marked all over the world, including Toronto.

Funding IN Action
UJA FEDERATION

When Helen Cameron is not busy with her many hobbies, grandchildren or friends, she brings her warm smile and her bag of Jewish goodies to seniors living in nursing homes. The UJA Federation funded Chaplaincy Service is designed to provide companionship to Jewish community members who are sick or isolated. "I bring a little piece of Jewishness – Israeli music, Yiddish games, even homemade latkes, to those who may not receive it in their current living environment," says Helen. "It's a real mitzvah."

NEVER TOO OLD

"Often, there are only one or two Jewish residents in a nursing home. I am glad that I can do something that gives me satisfaction, but also brightens and enriches the lives of the seniors," beams Helen. "I feel terrific that I can provide the Yiddish connection for them."

Rose Bell, 85, a resident at Cheltenham Nursing Home couldn't be happier with Helen's visits. "It's wonderful to be able to talk about Jewish holidays and reminisce about the past," says Rose. "You're never too old to learn new things."

REMARKABLE DIFFERENCE

"The real joy is that I truly believe what I am doing makes a difference. I see some 85 and 90 year old people sing to Hebrew music or recite passages from the Hagadah – it's remarkable," says Helen. "These are people who would not have the opportunity to be exposed to their Jewish customs."

The Chaplaincy Service emphasizes the belief that all Jews wherever they live are important members of our community. It's another example of UJA Federation Funding in Action.

Peretz essay on Zionism a tour de force

In this paper, as indeed throughout the Anglo-Jewish media, articles have appeared all year on the subject of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the modern Zionist movement.

The first Zionist conference in Basel 100 years ago was actually held on the weekend of Aug. 29, and into the first days of September. That explains why a flurry of such features have appeared in recent days .

By far, the most ambitious and the best of those features that I have seen is the special "section" on the subject published in the Sept. 5 and 12 issue of The New Republic (TNR). It is entitled Zionism at 100 and it has three parts.

The first part is an essay by Martin Peretz. The second is a symposium of 16 prominent writers and thinkers each of whom contributes approximately 1,000 words on the subject of Zionism. The third part comprises The Diarist's page, what regular TNR readers will recognize as the desultory-like musings and thoughts that appear on the inside back page. The contributor in this issue is Leon Wieseltier, TNR's literary editor.

Peretz' essay is a sharp contrast in scope and in mood to that of Halkin. It is a tour de force. In more than 10,000 words, it sweeps across the past 100 years, recalling history and human labor and reflecting upon the result. It is called "The God That Did Not Fail." It is a primer on the Zionist movement; it is informative, expansive and even entertaining.

Naturally enough, it begins with an outline of the silhouette cast by the giant, Theodor Herzl. Peretz writes forcefully but not fawningly, as can be seen by his concluding paragraph, part of which I excerpt:.

"Herzl had eight years in the limelight, eight years in the cause. He died in 1904 at the age of 44 and we have many testimonies to the press of Jewish humanity that massed at his funeral in Vienna. The movement that he founded went on, and on, to victory, but his own family collapsed..."

Peretz provides the reader a "deep" context for the rise, struggle, achievements, failures and ultimate success of Zionism. And he is certainly not reluctant to make broad, bold assertions.

"If socialism was the God that failed, then Zionism was the God that did not fail. I do not mean to say that Zionism was, or is, a God. It was too rambunctious, too contentious and too democratic to become an orthodoxy.

"But Zionism was an ideology, emerging from the high tides of ideologies, and its secular, worldly promise was certainly revolutionary. Of all the modern promises of transformation, Zionism is the only one to have accomplished what it set out to do – and to have done so with reasonable decency. The narrative of this century is cluttered with brutalized hopes, brutalized bodies, brutalized language. Socialism, communism, Third Worldism, pan-Arabism, even neutralism: all these isms, with their grandiose aims and their callous means...are already receding into the mists of time."

Peretz does not so much "conclude" his essay as he does provoke more last page thought.

"The Zionists brought to Zion at least three advantages.The first was pragmatism, practicality, a willingness to compromise. Their state is itself a monument to compromise...

"The second advantage was that the Zionists came with a confident notion of what their nation was, a confidence springing from the fact that this was the nation that more or less invented the idea of peoplehood.

"The third advantage was the advantage of the modern. For this reason, Zionism was a genuine revolution in its region. Was modernity a foreign, Western import, as the critics like to say? Of course. That is why it worked." MBD

Kol Hakovod, Voice of Dignity

TORONTO — Thirteen Canadian rabbis from diverse backgrounds have formed a group to help promote respect and cooperation within the Jewish community.

Meeting recently in Montreal under the auspices of Canadian Jewish Congress' religious and interreligious affairs committee chair Ottawa Rabbi Reuven Bulka, the group was assembled to discuss the divisiveness that exists among rabbis and Jewish communities around the world.

"This urgent meeting was greeted with a genuine spirit of camaraderie and resolve," Rabbi Bulka noted. "During discussions, it became evident that we must move beyond bland declarations of support for Jewish communal unity, and toward active promotion of community cohesion in an atmosphere of respect and mentshlechkeit."

The group,'called Kol Hakovod, Voice of Dignity, is comprised of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis. It hopes to implement a number of ideas, among them:

- having all Canadian rabbis affiliated with synagogues listed in Congress' national synagogue directory;
- setting up an Internet site to enable the public to access information and contribute ideas;
- establishing a national Kol Hakovod Day, which might include solidarity rallies.

Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple observed that "this first meeting was small, but a small step in a process which we hope will be inclusive and lead to mutual respect and a better understanding of each other."

Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David Congregation suggested that in many ways, the tenor of the initial meeting reflected the overwhelming sentiment of Canadian Jewry.

"We believe that there is a consensus in the community to find a way to acknowledge our differences and move forward together," he said.

A session involving pulpit rabbis from the various streams of Judaism is being considered for the Congress national plenary next May in Winnipeg.

"It is our hope that our organization can be the bridge of understanding to ensure unity and civil discourse among Canadian Jewry," noted Congress president Goldie Hershon.

CZF won't hold elections for delegates to WZO

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There will be no elections for Canadian delegates to the upcoming World Zionist Congress in Jerusalem.

As well, Canada's share of delegates to the congress, to take place in December, has been reduced from the 21 it had last time, to 15 or 16 this time.

The Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) has decided not to hold nation-wide elections for delegates, saying they would be too costly and expend energy in the wrong direction.

The CZF cancelled elections for the last congress, in 1992, citing the expenses involved. This time, apart from expenses, CZF president Kurt Rothschild says constituent agencies and their roughly 25,000 members "don't have the stomach" for a vote.

Rothschild says he's "implacably opposed" to elections for delegates anyway, saying they are expensive, divisive and can produce skewed results.

Rothschild assures that Canadian delegates to the congress will be divided fairly across the religious and political spectrum by CZF member agencies.

Canada has "strongly urged" the WZO for more delegates, and its reduced allotment will be appealed, but Rothschild doesn't expect the number to change.

The reason the number of Canadian delegates was reduced is because of the overall reallocation and reduction of delegates the world over, and not because Canada has less clout, Rothschild explained in a CJN interview World Zionist congresses are held every four or five years and bring Zionists to Israel from around the world to hammer out priorities and policies of the World Zionist Organization (WZO). Some 500 delegates are expected at the coming congress, the 33rd, to take place Dec. 23 to 27. It will also mark the 100th anniversary of the first congress in Basel.

Traditionally, Israel receives 38 percent of delegates, and the United States 29 percent, with the remainder from the rest of the world.

The WZO shares responsibility for the $500 million (US) annual budget of the Jewish Agency, its organizational partner, with most of that money earmarked for immigrant absorption and education. A sizeable portion of those funds comes from North American United Jewish Appeals.

At the 1992 congress, Orthodox Zionists (from the organizations Mizrachi and Emunah) had the most delegates among the Canadians, with five, followed by Reform Zionists (from Kadima) with four, and Conservatives (from Mercaz) with three. The remainder were divided among smaller factions, which, because of the reduced number of delegates allotted to Canada, may be frozen out this time.

Rothschild, in the meantime, is critical of the election of delegates from the United States, which will send 145 representatives to the congress.

Nasty campaign

Roughly 150,000 ballots have been mailed to would-be voters in the United States, and the campaign has become nasty, fueled by "hot-button" issues like Israel's conversion bill.

For Reform and Conservative Zionists in the United States, religious pluralism has become the central issue. The two were also the most ardent champions of elections, seeking to shift power away from the Orthodox (and Likud) camp.

Mailings from ARZA, the U.S. Reform body's Zionist arm, show a Star of David fractured in two to reflect, presumably, the divisions sown by Orthodox and right-wing parties in Israel.

The American Friends of Likud, meantime, are distributing a videotaped appeal by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert to "defend" the city "against the viciousness of [Yasser] Arafat and the Palestine Authority."

While Rothschild doesn't deny there are heated opinions in Canada, at least they won't be aired publicly.

"Zionist strength should be derived from working together and being united in purpose – to support the state of Israel – rather than engaging in inter-group, public controversies."

Rothschild said he's not aware of any country but the United States to hold elections for delegates. The American vote has produced "disharmony and divisiveness that undermine the strength and relevance of the WZO" and "are not a reflection of true democracy."

The cost of the U.S. election "is inappropriate" at a time funds could be better spent on education and social needs, Rothschild added.

Elections are prescribed under the WZO's constitution, which Rothschild terms "out of step with reality" and "not necessarily conducive to the democratic process." The delegate selection process "should be less democratic and more a mosaic. Our primary task is not necessarily an exercise in democracy but to give expression to different viewpoints in a fair manner."

The U.S. delegation, Rothschild predicts, will be sharply divided along religious and political lines. Canadian Zionists, he stressed, will be "represented fairly. There is a good understanding among all groups."

Baycrest, Kehilla join to build seniors' housing

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the Kehilla Residential Programme have joined forces to build a seniors housing project planned with an eye on the future.

Stephanie Olin-Chapman, executive director of Kehilla, a non-profit housing agency whose mandate is to provide affordable housing for the Jewish community, says the project is among the first of its kind in Canada. It will be located on Neptune Drive, on land previously occupied by Associated Hebrew Schools.

"It is similar to American models in that the building is designed to permit aging in place," says Chapman.

As people age, she explains, their physical abilities change and the apartments will be built to accommodate these changes.

"All doorways will be wide enough for wheelchairs, the bathroom will be prepared to install a grab bar and there will be room throughout the apartment to manoeuvre a walker. As well, the light switches will be at the right level, the floor will be non-slip and pre-wiring will be done for an emergency all-call system. These are things that will permit a person to continue to live independently in their own home. If someone visits, however, they will not notice anything is different."

Moshe Greengarten, vice-president, public and community affairs at Baycrest Centre, says that the Jewish community is older than the general population in the area and it is important to address its needs. "This will be a supportive, seniors-only environment, and the design and services are geared to them. We plan to offer a homemakers service, meal service and visiting nurses. There is also the possibility of an on-site doctor's office. It's a great location because it is close to Baycrest; so people can buy into its services without being part of the institution."

The apartments, which will be available in one-bedroom, two-bedroom and two-bedroom with a den, are "life equity" units, which differ from condominiums in that the resident purchases a right to occupy a specific unit, rather than purchasing the title to their unit. They hope to have a number of units available as rentals, says Greengarten.

The purchaser of a life equity unit, he says, makes a lump sum prepayment which covers the cost of developing and constructing the units and common areas. The life equity operating agreement provides seniors with the right to occupy their unit for as long as they desire or are able. When it is time to move, the non-profit corporation buys back the lease or arranges for a transfer to the next resident. There are no real estate agents or marketing concerns.

Residents, he says, share in the monthly operating costs through payment of a break-even monthly occupancy fee, which includes common area costs and maintenance fees.

He adds that the life equity concept allows them to restrict residency to seniors. "A condominium corporation cannot do this. Anyone can buy a condominium."

He says several focus groups will be held throughout the fall for seniors and their relatives, so that prospective purchasers can have input into what features they would like to see in the apartments. "The first purchasers will have the opportunity to have their suite custom-built."

Apartments should be ready for occupancy by spring or summer of 1999. For information call 932-2560.

Groups meet with 'synagogue' plaza owner

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Jewish community officials were tight-lipped but confident that a resolution will soon be reached on the City of David Messianic Synagogue in Thornhill, following a meeting last week with the owner of the plaza in which the congregation is located.

The owner, Aetna Canada, "did not rule out the possibility" that the congregation could be induced to leave the plaza, said Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Community leaders who met with Aetna, including those from B'nai Brith and Jews for Judaism, "made it clear that we are demanding that this tenant cease to be a tenant," Ronen said, adding Aetna did not discount that option.

Inducing City of David to leave is "among the options being considered," Patricia Smith, Aetna's senior vice-president, told The CJN. "But I don't think the tenant wants that. One of the reasons he's in that location is because he wants to be there."

Smith said lawyers for Aetna are examining the congregation's recently signed six-year lease, and are looking "at a number of options."

One of them, she explained, is to force the congregation, whose adherents say they are Jews who worship Jesus, to change its two signs, from synagogue to church.

Aetna undertook the meetings with Jewish groups in order to better understand the situation, she said. "Our understanding has grown every day. We're now in a position where we are trying to resolve the needs of a community [in which] those needs are diverse."

Aetna is scheduled to meet the congregation's spiritual leader, Jeff Forman, this week, while a followup meeting with CJC is slated for mid-week, at which time a resolution may be arrived at.

Ronen was upbeat about the meeting, saying CJC is "satisfied" Aetna is taking the matter "very seriously."

He said the company indicated it would explore "other avenues," but that there was an agreement that details would not be disclosed.

Ronen said he's willing to give the owners the benefit of the doubt, but warned that "pressure" would continue and "various legal options" explored should a resolution prove unsatisfactory.

The congregation, at the corner of Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue, in the heart of Jewish Thornhill, has been at the centre of a huge storm in the Jewish community, with charges that it is an evangelical church masquerading as a synagogue, and will target vulnerable Jews for conversion.

Critics of the congregation say it chose its location carefully and deliberately in order to reach out to Jews and Jewish immigrants.

There have been several boisterous protests outside the congregation, with area politicians, members of the public and former members of the Jewish Defence League denouncing it as deceptive. Regular demonstrations are planned.

Julius Ciss, director of the counter-missionary group, Jews for Judaism, says he's received warnings that there will be arrests for loitering and blocking traffic should the militant nature of the protests continue.

Ciss said he got a good sense that Aetna wants the matter defused.

"We want [the congregation] out," he said. "But it may have every legal right to be there."

Jews for Judaism will hold a town hall meeting on the controversy on Sept. 29 at 8 p.m. at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, just north of the plaza.

Dangerous deceivers

It is not an exaggeration to say that the demographic heart of the Jewish community of Greater Toronto is at or near the intersection of Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue.

Joining North York to Thornhill, the intersection teems with Jewish life. It pulsates with the rhythms, colors, customs, scents and cuisines of many different Jewish cultures: Canadian, Israeli, Russian, Moroccan, to name the most prevalent. The area is as close to a modern reincarnation as we have ever seen of the post-World War II cacophonous Jewish immigrant neighborhoods bursting with exploration, urgency, excitement and creativity. The smooth, perfect dome on the roof of the newly-opened Sephardic Kehila Centre dominates the landscape, sublime architectural proof of the Jewish vitality of the neighborhood.

Into that neighborhood however, has come a group of dangerous deceivers. And the Jewish community must now be alert.

Just over a month ago, an outpost of Christian proselytizers, appeared in one of the small shopping plazas in the intersection's northwest corner. But they had neither the honesty nor the integrity to identify themselves as what they truly are, namely a church. Rather, they presented themselves to the public as a synagogue. They call themselves City of David Messianic Synagogue. City of David is written both in English and in Hebrew.

The deception is double.

A synagogue is where Jewish prayers are heard, where Jewish doctrine is practised, where Jewish theology is taught and where the Jewish faith is worshipped. City of David is not a synagogue. The use of the term is fraudulent as is the use of Hebrew on their sign. Both usages are insidious, calculated only to create the association with Judaism and therefore the assumption in the mind of the unknowing public that the place is Jewish. And that association, of course, is a magnet, drawing toward it the confused, the curious and always the lonely.

The danger, of course, lies in their purpose, which is to convert Jews away from our Judaism. They openly admit to wanting to "reach Jews."

But we as an organized community must resist their furtive grasp. Julius Ciss, executive director of Jews for Judaism, identified the group as being "part of the fundamentalist Protestant movement. As reported in The CJN, he issued "an urgent warning to Toronto's Jewish community." We must be wary, Ciss said. By employing Hebrew and other Jewish trappings, they succeed in pulling in vulnerable people, such as seniors, recent immigrants and the young.

The issue for us is not the attempt to proselytize Jews away from the faith of our forebears, although we find the attempt to do so an indignity and contemptible. Jewish history is full of the pain and the loss caused by proselytizers. But Canadian law enshrines the right to proselytize. We take no issue with Canadian law.

The issue for us is the manner by which this group exercises its right. They venture into the very core of Toronto's Jewish world and by guile and deceit, lure their prey into their anti-Jewish snare.

We commend our community leaders who are seeking to counter the behavior of the church. They must not waver in their efforts.

Nor should we, the community, yield to this obtrusive, offensive conduct. The deceivers who dwell in that false city of David must be told that we consider what they have done and what they are trying to do, to be villainous and vile, an assault against Jews and no less harmful to us merely because our bodies do not bleed.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"Many (western) Jews try to save themselves by flight from Judaism. But racial anti-Semitism denies the power of change by baptism, and this mode of salvation does not seem to have much prospect."

(From Nordau's address: The Situation Of The Jews Throughout The World)

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

Born Sept. 17, 1879, Peter Bercovitch was the first Jewish member of the National Assembly of Quebec (1917 - 1938).(Canadian Jewish Congress Archives)

Let the woman give the man a get

Let me offer three reasons why a woman should be permitted to give a man a get under Jewish law.

The first reason is simply that it is a gross injustice to associate the interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1 to mean that only the man can give a get to his wife. The abuses of this power are well known. This interpretation of Deuteronomy 24:1 has caused great suffering.

The second reason is the way in which this interpretation undermines the dignity of Jewish law. There have been moves by the secular state as a remedy for this deficiency in Jewish law to establish laws against the placing of religious obstacles to marriage. Thus, this interpretation undermines the scriptural idea that "Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people" [Deuteronomy 4:6], by virtue of its possession and understanding of the Torah.

The third reason is the text of Deuteronomy 24:1 itself, the source of the belief that only the husband may give a get. The text of Deuteronomy 24:1 states "that he write her a bill of divorce and place it in her hand ve-shlichah..."

There is a peculiarity about the word shlichah, which the Talmud in Kiddushin 41a notes. The rabbis observed that it can be interpreted in two senses and discussed the matter in relation to certain rights of betrothal available to women.

The text of Deuteronomy 24:1 applies, in the first place, to divorce not to betrothal. But the rabbis read out of this verse concerning divorce, prerogatives concerning betrothal enjoyed by women.

If they were able to find this meaning from the text, should we not then also understand that the prerogative of divorce may be held by women a priori?

Rejects idea of Torah codes

Barry Levy was not only very diplomatic, but truly scholarly in commenting on the issue of so-called hidden Torah codes, which have the power of predicting the future. He did note that so far the "decoders" have only been able to predict the past. (CJN, Aug. 7 and 14)

In a letter to the editor, David Weinper asserted the belief that Torah does contain hidden, secretly coded messages predicting future events.

If Torah does contain so many hidden secret messages predicting the future, it must be concluded:

- In view of the Shoah, Torah scholars have done a lousy job of studying the holy text because they did not spot the Holocaust's occurrence prior to its massive devastation.
- We are worshipping some kind of demon who loves to play games with its devotees, by very cleverly hiding such information as its planned mass torture and destruction of these people.
- Life is some kind of giant crossword puzzle created by that demon.

Hence, it appears that the ideas of divinely hidden codes in the Torah text lead to rather impossible theological implications that are not only absurd but especially perverse.

If such hidden codes truly did exist, then I would have to reject all of Torah and Judaism because that way of life would be no better than a life lived in accordance with the fortune card teller's hand, let alone some kind of giant crossword puzzle.

Since I am not prepared to reject Torah and Judaism, I therefore must reject the ideas of hidden codes in Torah.

A statistical approach to Torah codes

I would like to criticize the otherwise well written two-part article on Bible codes (Aug. 7 and 14) by Barry Levy, professor of Jewish studies. First, why did you not assign this topic to a mathematician who could discuss whether the codes are statistically significant?

Second, there is an assumption by Levy and others that deciphering codes in the Bible is an arcane method and off-limits. I have attended lectures on the Torah codes and I was enthralled by the research.

If the Bible serves as a work of literature, a fount of inspiration, and a source of morality and how to conduct one's life, why can it not also be observed from a mathematical perspective? After all, it is in mathematics that one finds elegance and beauty.

It is interesting to note that the first word and first sentence of the Hebrew Bible are composed of six and 28 letters, the first two perfect numbers (a perfect number is equal to the sum of its divisors). Moreover, the sentence is also composed of seven words, a highly significant number in the Torah.

Perspectives

The healing American influence

By ABBA EBAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Public opinion surveys have consistently shown that support for the Oslo peace process is greater than the combined strength of any two or three political parties. This reality was expressed in Foreign Minister David Levy's warning this week that he "would not remain in a government that would destroy the peace." There is probably a majority in the Knesset who share this view.

This means that if any of the parties intends to use the current crisis to jettison treaty obligations, it may have to revise its thinking, especially if the U.S. position is still firmly anchored in the principle of exchanging captured territories for durable peace.

Enthusiasm for Oslo is understandably not at a record high today. But it is sustained by the total absence of any alternative and by the certainty that other formulas would darken the only realistic prospect that has illuminated Israeli life since the White House encounter in 1993. The nation is simply not in a mood to abandon the Oslo accords.

Until recently, Israel had to seek its alliances far outside the Middle East. In World War I, the auspices were British. After World War II, the UN, in a rare surge of U.S.-Soviet cooperation, gave in to a decisive impulse to recognize Israel as a sovereign nation.

For a "brief shining moment" in the 1950s, France supplied the weaponry and strategic deterrent that made victories possible. In all the ensuing decades, the United States has supported Israel's security with unflagging vigilance and constancy.

The administrations of Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres were the first to remind Israelis that no extraneous friendship, however warm, can compensate for the absence of a harmonious regional order.

The priority of regional concern seems to have receded since our recent election. While it lasted, the results were sensational. Within a single year, we had peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan, relations at various diplomatic levels with Morocco, Tunisia, Oman, Qatar and Mauritania, and enhanced relations with Turkey, together with the effective suspension of the Arab economic boycott.

The European Union (EU)– our chief market for expanding trade and technological support – also developed a creative diplomatic role. Economic conferences at Casablanca, Amman, Cairo and Washington brought bankers, industrialists and economic experts together to examine serious regional projects. There was an improved environment for Israel in the Vatican and at the UN.

It is outrageous for A.M. Rosenthal to write in the New York Times that "Egypt's idea of peace is nastiness and insult." Those who profess friendship for Israel should not pollute the air with their undisciplined virulence.

The unravelling of these achievements has been dramatic. It cannot be overcome by appeals to one of the parties alone. The movement for peace began with Egypt and could not have begun anywhere else. Egypt is now irascible; Jordan is alienated; Morocco does not welcome Israeli leaders; Qatar is reluctant to assemble investors; the members of the EU are puzzled by the vagaries of Israeli policies.

It is sad to reflect that our most consensual hour may be behind us, not ahead of us.

The achievements of 1996 could not have collapsed without negative "contributions" from the Palestinian and Israeli leadership alike. The key to success for Madeleine Albright's mission is convergence. Both parties must move; neither has the option of standing still.

Yasser Arafat is the principal person to whom Albright must turn for remedy and change, but the idea that peace can be reconstructed on the basis of a virtually imprisoned Palestinian population, held in a squalid vice of economic decay and administrative subjection, is too grotesque for the imagination to sustain. The punitive measures imposed since the Machane Yehuda tragedy were always disproportionate and unselective.

American interests are one of the major considerations now at issue. The peace process could never have developed any dynamism without active U.S. sponsorship. Both parties, Israeli and Palestinian, were the beneficiaries of its early successes. Arafat's embrace of a Hamas leader was an error of grandiose proportions. It violated every canon of sanity, decency and common sense.

The readiness of the United States to enter the complexities of this situation did not come a single day too soon. In the present alignments of world power, there is no substitute for the moderating, pragmatic and potentially healing exercise of American influence. Nothing could be more perilous than for any party to represent the United States as impotent or lacking in reach. Whichever of them takes that risk will incur dire responsibility and heavy international guilt.

Abba Eban is a former Israeli foreign minister.

American Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Yasser Arafat met last week during her visit to the region. She minced no words in saying more was expected in the fight against terror. [RNS/Reuters]

Feeling fed up with Arafat

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

"It takes two parties to pursue peace, and both parties must want peace. I had thought up to this point that Yasser Arafat wants peace. I must say, honestly, I no longer believe that to be the case."

Following the bombings on Ben Yehuda Street two weeks ago, the above appeared in a statement issued by California Senator Dianne Feinstein. The senator has always been a leading supporter of the peace process, but until now, not really a critic of the PLO leader.

Feinstein says that viewing the television images of the casualties was one ugly experience too many, especially after Arafat's now-infamous embrace of Hamas leader Abdel Aziz Rantisi in Gaza two weeks earlier.

That hug undermined the PLO's already shaky image in the U.S. Congress, say lawmakers and observers.

Many of the condemnations issued by members of Congress after the bombings went beyond the usual outrage. They called for both an immediate cut-off of aid to the Palestinian Authority and a reassessment of U.S. involvement with Arafat.

Feinstein also expressed the view prevailing on Capitol Hill even before the recent attack, when she stated that Congress should not renew the now-lapsed Middle East Peace Facilitation Act (MEPFA), the law governing U.S. relations with the PLO.

While very little of the roughly $100 million in annual U.S. assistance to the Palestinians goes directly to the PA, Congress made its point that Arafat has crossed a dangerous threshold. A senior U.S. official said that following Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's visit to the region this week, the administration would approach Congress about legislating a new MEPFA.

A pro-Israel lobbyist called the Arafat-Rantisi hug "a watershed event for Congress. Most people I've spoken to on the Hill reacted the same way: Enough," he said. "Up to now, there's been a tolerance of this stuff. The combination of that meeting in Gaza with the bombing, has made people feel it's untenable. There had been a sense things would be okay. Now there's not. There's a sense maybe the guy's not serious."

In statements and letters to Albright after the latest bombing, several members of Congress pressed her to get tough with Arafat and keep security concerns front and center on the agenda.

Congress' bipartisan leadership coauthored a letter to Albright last week stating that if the Palestinians do not adopt the anti-terrorism steps she demanded in her Aug. 6 speech, "the U.S. has little else to talk to them about.

"Arafat and the leaders of the PA must live up to their solemn obligation or risk an end to the relationship with and support of the U.S.," they warned.

Feinstein still has faith in the peace process. But now, following the Ben Yehuda Street bombing, she says she's had enough.

"This one, for some reason, becomes almost like the straw that breaks the camel's back. And I think when it came following Yasser Arafat's embrace of Hamas leaders ...things that people in public office do become symbolic gestures. And these symbolic gestures send signals.

"I thought that Yasser Arafat wanted peace, [but] I am becoming more and more convinced that the chairman may not. And that disturbs me very much, because you can't negotiate unless both [sides] want peace.

"Now I'm the first one to say that I think there have been provocations, whether it's the [Western Wall] tunnel opening or Har Choma, things that could have been done differently. But I do not see the signals being sent out by the Palestinian leadership in a way that's definitive and positive and followed up with action, that have convinced me that Arafat isn't trying to carry water on both shoulders. When it comes to terror, I don't believe you can do that...

"I think this is an Israeli issue and Israelis have to speak for themselves," Feinstein says. "But I, for one, as a U.S. Senator on the Foreign Relations Committee, will not vote for renewal of MEPFA until I see some real progress made against terrorist organizations. And that includes rooting out their infrastructure, it includes arresting and imprisoning their leaders, their activists."

Asked whether cutting off MEPFA or financial assistance would hurt the Palestinian people, Feinstein is unapologetic.

"The Palestinian people also have to make up their minds whether they want peace and are willing to take a stand," she says. "There has to be a desire for peace on both sides. We know that terrorism is aimed at destroying peace; therefore, I think the time has come when the Palestinian people really have to indicate that they want peace."

Opinions

Stones From the River

Annually, Jews are exhorted to conduct a cheshbon nefesh, an accounting of our deeds over the past year. This is a painful process. Not only our deeds, the petty, nasty things we perpetrated on those close to us, but the sharp words we spoke, the vengeful intent behind our words, should be entered in the column of failures.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

What about those attitudes we carry from year to year, hugging them close to our hearts and refusing to let go, even when they harm us? They are the hardest to deal with. This year a book I read brought this painfully home.

Stones From the River, by Ursula Hegi, is a fictional account of the life of Trudi Montag, a dwarf born in a small German town before World War I and growing up in the interwar and World War II periods. Considered a freak by the townspeople, she becomes at once the town scapegoat and its repository of secrets. Her already difficult life is irrevocably altered when she is assaulted by three boys, one of whom had been her only childhood friend. Her anger at her treatment, all the wounds and slights she has suffered, explodes. She hurls stone after stone into the river, cursing her life and her body.

The anger remains, although she and her father persevere, sheltering Jews fleeing the Nazis and trying to protect the Jews of the town. The war ends; the Jews are dead. The town comes back to life, with few men returning from the war and the majority of folk refusing to recognize their complicity in the Holocaust. Despite their suffering, they cling to their old attitudes. Trudi has lost her lover in the bombing of Dresden, her father has died; and yet it is to her that many now turn. At the end of the book, she is ready for the rest of life.

> Storytelling used to deal with her anger

In one scene she carefully constructs a tower of stone, this time to remember those she loved and those who loved her. And she reflects: "Yet, as her eyes followed the river, she could all at once see how the end of every motion became the beginning of the next, how the water that came up against a rock found a new pattern as it joined the rest of the stream, how the crest of every wave became the descent into the rocky hollow."

Why am I recounting this story? Because some few readers might remember that my very first column in this paper dealt with my encounter with the Holocaust. Coming to it as an adult, I remained more angry and bitter than many survivors I interviewed. This kind of hate and anger remains with me. How do I deal with it?

One way Trudi deals with her anger is to tell stories. Some are fantasies to amuse her few friends; others are cruel, to punish those who persecute her. In fact, the novel itself seems to be a story told by its author, a German-born American woman, to deal with her own feelings.

I begin by telling a story of my own.

I have a German-Canadian colleague. Like me, she was born as the war broke out. While as a child she and her family sent soldiers to the war, my family patrolled with the home guard. Her air-raids were real, mine were precautionary. We saved tin foil from things like gum wrappers and supposedly the large foil balls were turned in war material. She remembers allied planes dropping sheets of aluminum which, she was told, were to foil tracking of the bombers pounding Germany. By war's end, her family farm was the sole source of food for her large Catholic family. In Canada she is a successful businesswoman with many Jewish clients and friends, some of them survivors.

There are many things we do not say to each other, but there are many we share.

She is one stone in my tower of stones of forgiveness. I will have to seek out other stories, and like Trudi construct tower after tower until my cheshbon nefesh does not need to include this weight of hate.

Some crumbs for Tashlich

With Rosh Hashanah soon upon us, it is time to plan where to go to perform the ceremony of Tashlich and to determine which of our past actions need forgiveness.

By Shel Krakofsky in London

Tashlich is Hebrew for "cast" and it refers to the act of visiting a place of flowing water on the first day of the New Year and symbolically casting away the sins of the preceding year. The tradition is to throw crumbs of bread representing our sins into the water.

A friend of our family, call her Wendy, claims to have had such a bad year some time ago, she went down to the water very upset with herself. She did not lightly toss some crumbs. Wendy took an entire loaf of bread and with great force, heaved the whole thing into the water!

Tossing an entire loaf into the drink may be cathartic but it does lack a certain subtlety, delineation and introspection. Recently I received a list that is much more specific. Because I don't want to be accused of the sin of non-attribution, I tried to track down the source. It turned into a biblical quest of "begats." One person received it from another who gave it to somebody else who passed it on to etc. etc.

I still don't know the original source. Anyway, here is my list with changes and additions. Readers are welcome to add their own even as they proceed to the water thinking about what to throw in.

- for ordinary sins — white bread
- for exotic sins — croissants
- for the sin of apostasy — hot cross buns
- for sins of indecision — waffles
- for sins of haste — matzah
- for excessive irony — rye bread
- for sins of blandness — sponge cake
- for the sin of arson — toast
- for arson in Quebec — French toast
- for sexual impropriety — tarts
- for sins of injury — torts
- for twisted logic — pretzels
- for exaggerated hubris — baguette
- for very dark sins — pumpernickle
- for living an uncentred life — bagels
- for kissing up — brownies
- for the sin of fraud — fudge brownies
- for being spineless — eclairs
- for being a malcontent — sourdough
- for being silly — nut bread
- for telling bad jokes — corn bread
- for the sin of racism — crackers
- for being too tearful — onion rolls
- for being too cheerful — jelly donuts
- for complex sins — multigrain bread
- for tasteless sins — rice cakes
- for hardening one's heart — mandelbrot
- for being too soft — challah
- for too much chutzpah — fresh bread
- for no sins — angel cake (not so fast!)

To one and all, Shanah Tovah.

The Pope and the Jews

Anyone who attempts to write about someone else's religion touches a tender subject. Both reader and writer are, so to speak, put on trial. This is particularly true when writing about the Roman Catholic Church, which in the last decade, under the leadership of John Paul II, has forged strong links with our people.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

A recent article in the New Yorker, written by a Roman Catholic priest, combines in a unique way the adulation of the Pope by the writer and the yet unresolved agony that still exists in the souls of many, including his own. The piece, entitled The Silence, has the sub-heading "John Paul II has forged a new relationship between Catholics and Jews. He also upholds papal infallibility. To do so he must maintain the silence surrounding the Church and the Holocaust. Will that be his tragedy?"

The first part of the article by Father James Carroll is nothing less than a panegyric of John Paul: his enormous success in spreading the influence of the Church in all parts of the world; his indefatigable travels; and his ability to command the attention of the world when he makes a pronouncement. The article traces his path from his youth in Krakow — where his opposition to the Nazis first called him to the attention of his superiors and sent him on his way to Rome – all the way to the attempt on his life, his appeal across religious borders, which includes Muslims, his conservatism on the one hand and his liberalism on the other. And then there are the Jews to whom – with the exception of Pope John XXIII – he has been closer than any of his predecessors.

But there is the problem of the Holocaust. He has spoken of it movingly on many occasions and there is no question of the sorrow that he feels when this dreadful subject comes up for discussion. The only missing piece in the edifice of total reconciliation, writes Father Carroll, is his persistent silence about the role of the Church during the Nazi period. He has vigorously condemned the dehumanization that the Church practised with regard to the Jews in centuries past, but he has skirted the subject of the role that Pius XII played.

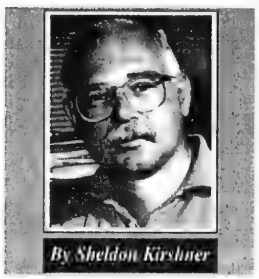
The Anti-Defamation League's Abraham Foxman has established a special relationship with John Paul. "When you talk to him it is as though the whole world does not exist. He talks only to you," he says.

But then Foxman turns to the subject of hidden Jews – those who as children were given to Catholic families in order to save their lives, but whose background has never been revealed to them or to the world. Foxman has become their advocate and so far, every appeal to the Church and to the Pope to take some remedial steps in this direction by opening the hidden records of the Church has fallen on deaf ears. That is "the silence" to which Father Carroll refers. It touches the past and concerns the present. The writer of this long and moving article is clearly agonizing over the moral dilemma that becomes apparent and will remain a blot on Catholic-Jewish relations as long as it is allowed to exist.

The Kirshner File

The kings of klezmer music

The Epstein Brothers, the irrepressible klezmer kings, were at full throttle on this Saturday night in Toronto,



By Sheldon Kirshner

pumping out a crescendo of rollicking music in a concert straight from the heart.

When Willie, the older brother, announced that the band was about to play its last number of the evening, a palpable groan of disappointment filled every crevice of the theatre at the Harbourfront Centre.

For a little more than an hour at the recent Festival of New Yiddish Culture (Ashkenaz), the Epsteins had dazzled the crowd, riding to artistic triumph on an infectious wave of nostalgia.

Clad in tight-fitting tuxedos, they played Romanian doinas, chassidic and Bessarabian dances and Russian and Hungarian medleys, among other show stoppers.

All eyes were on Willie, 78, who wailed on a trumpet until his face turned ruddy, and on his younger brother, Julie, 70, who sat buddha-like as he stirred up a storm on drums. They were backed up by Ray Musiker on clarinet, Peter Sokolow on piano and Paul Pincus on saxophone.

When they finished the final piece, which was as rousing and soulful as the preceding numbers, their fans rose in a collective tribute of hand-clapping admiration.

The Epsteins, the inimitable Epsteins, had done it again.

A day prior to the concert, Willie and Julie, attired in sports jackets and open-necked shirts, talked about themselves and their craft over breakfast at a hotel in downtown Toronto.

A living link to the golden age of klezmer music, the Epsteins achieved a measure of renown long before leaving an astonishing impression in A Tickle in the Heart, the delightful documentary which had its world premiere at last year's Toronto International Film Festival.

"We were known already before the movie," said Julie, a gruff, talkative Damon Runyonesque character.

"Now we're in the category of celebrities," allowed Willie, a gentler version of Julie.

Through attrition and injury, the Epsteins have been reduced from a foursome to a duo. Max, 85, the centre of attention in A Tickle in the Heart, was hurt in a car accident not too long ago and can no longer travel, while Isadore (Chi) died nine years ago. "We miss him terribly," said Willie, speaking of his deceased brother. "He lent a certain sound to the group. He was irreplaceable."

The Epsteins, who recently came out with a two-hour cassette of their recordings, were born in New York City's Lower East Side, the sons of East European immigrants. Samuel, the patriarch of the clan, arrived in America from Pinsk in 1906, a humble tailor who could not carry a musical note and who, Willie observed, tended to whistle in a monotone.

Most probably, the Epsteins' affinity for music can be traced to their energetic maternal grandfather, who was in his 70s when he took his first formal violin lesson.

"Max got into music first and he handed it down to us," said Julie. "It was like a trade. We grew up with klezmer. We learned from the masters. Alex Fidel. Yitzhik Drutin. Dave Tarras. Naftul Brandwein. We copied their style and adapted it to fit our own."

Back in those days, a musician usually had a day job and regarded music strictly as a sideline. The Epsteins, however, were different. "We were never anything but musicians. Our father wanted us to be honest and hard-working, and we were," said Julie.

They performed at weddings, bar mitzvahs and clubs, appeared on radio programs and churned out numerous records. "Unless you're a Yitzhak Perlman, you have to wear a lot of hats to make a living," noted Willie.

During the 1950s and 1960s, when they were at the previous height of their fame, the Epsteins never referred to themselves as klezmorim. "Klezmer wasn't in our lexicon. We called it 'Jewish music,'" explained Julie. "The 'klezmer' was the guy who played it."

When the Epsteins were younger, klezmer as an art form was in a state of decline, having been practically wiped out by the Holocaust. But by the late 1970s, the faint outline of a revival could be discerned. Bands such as the Chicago Klezmer Ensemble (which opened the Epsteins' concert at Ashkenaz), Kapelye, the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and the Klezmatics surfaced, creating a new generation of aficionados.

In the meantime, the Epsteins had moved to Florida, to a retirement community near Fort Lauderdale known as Tamarac, where they still reside with their families. From their base there, they wowed oldtimers who, in Willie's words, appreciated " the music you know and remember."

The Epsteins were "rediscovered" and cast into the wider world by Stefan Schwietert, a young Swiss documentarian who lived in Germany. He had thought in terms of making a film about the immortals of klezmer, but after interviewing the loquacious, colorful and telegenic Epsteins, he reportedly tore up the script and constructed A Tickle in the Heart around them.

A Tickle in the Heart, which garnered rave reviews in the general and Jewish press, was an affectionate portrait of the brothers and of klezmorim. It unfolded against the backdrop of a Berlin concert, Tamarac and environs, the old family homestead in Pinsk and the Lower East Side. The film not only revived their careers, but greatly revitalized klezmer.

Willie likes the film unreservedly. "It's marvellous."

Julie is still upset by the director's decision to excise several choice scenes, yet he acknowledges its importance. "How can I be critical when the film is a success."

Nowadays, the Epsteins do about 25 concerts a year. From Toronto, they embarked on a tour of Switzerland, Austria and Germany. "We haven't figured out why the Germans like our music," said Willie. "We accept German audiences for what they are. We're apolitical."

The Epsteins rarely rehearse. "We know everything we play," said Julie, not trying to sound boastful. Paradoxically, though, they never cease to be amazed by their capacity to learn "something new" in every concert.

"There is always a new wrinkle," said Willie. "As musicians, we try to be as knowledgeable as humanely possible."

Their objective always is to please fans. "We want people to leave singing and tapping." They attribute their popularity to an ability to produce "a different" sound.

Perhaps it appears arrogant, but the Epsteins consider themselves unique. "We're a one-of-a-kind band," said Julie.

Asked if klezmer will continue to flourish, the brothers were momentarily flummoxed. "It's impossible to say," Willie finally commented. But he is absolutely convinced that "young people" and their quest for "roots" gave klezmer its new lease on life.

The Epsteins, whose concerts usually last an hour and a half with an intermission, admit that "concertizing" can be a grind, particularly at their age.

"It's hard work, and the hardest part is travel and jet lag," said Julie. "We sleep whenever we can." He chuckled. "Our brains don't want to go as fast as we want to run, but on stage we're alert."

Despite their advanced years, they have no intention of quitting.

Julie: "I don't have to play golf to pass the time. Our avocation is our vocation."

Willie: "We'll go on until we drop dead."

Humans bestow jewels that computers cannot

By REVA KAISER

I wonder if the art of human interaction is dying. The explosion of modern-day electronic, magnetic and wave technology has made machines increasingly prevalent, and although there are advantages to their accessibility and many uses for them, not all are beneficial.

As machines invade every aspect of our lives, the result is a greater dependence of man on machine, and less of man on man; as people become more dependent on machine, the loss of human interaction is the price we pay.

Modern technology is pervasive. People have been replaced by machines in almost every facet of society. As more time is spent in front of PCs and less with people, we are honing our technological skills but ignoring our social ones. This is dangerous, considering the fact that technology is tightening our world into a closely knit global village, and we must not forget the pre-technological survival code: social interaction.

Each social setting provides us with different opportunities to learn about people and from them. We must make a conscious effort to glean from humans all the jewels that computers cannot bestow on us.

Raised in a Torah-observant home and educated in Jewish day schools, I have been inculcated with many priceless social skills and values. I commend my parents and teachers for their efforts in teaching me the skills required to succeed and blossom in these environments.

But I am now well out of the Jewish day school system and spending more time away from home. This summer, I entered a third and new social environment: the workplace.

I anticipated all the useful technical skills I'd gain during my internship at The Canadian Jewish News: conducting interviews, writing articles and editing stories. But at the conclusion of the eight-week internship, I realized that I had learned far more. From observing others and from my own interactions with the same people, I developed more of an understanding and appreciation of positive human relationships; I witnessed how, even under stressful conditions, people can work together successfully. I discovered just how essential this cooperative element is to our social existence and mental well-being.

Reva Kaiser

There is much to learn from other people that computers cannot teach us. Machines convey little about cooperation, kindness, understanding or compassion. They are useless when guidance, assistance, assurance and motivating praise are required.

As a member of the younger generation, I realize that we cannot focus our lives on all-encompassing technology, we must remember that we are humans – and, as such, we must develop our humanitarian skills to their fullest potential. Life is not all about nuts and bolts; it's about people – and loving and respecting them.

Granted, not all situations are perfect, and there are many negative and destructive social habits polluting the world. But the treatment of others in my first exposure to the "real world" showed me how simple it is to incorporate basic moral standards – Torah values and the essence of "do unto others..."– into the workplace. I arrived each day excited to be part of a cohesive business team and more importantly, a well-functioning social unit.

Much remains for me to see, experience and learn. But what I've learned about respect, cooperation and simple consideration for other people this summer is far more valuable to me than any of the technological skills I acquired.

I sincerely hope that all members of my generation have opportunities for similarly positive experiences and that all my future employment situations will be as beneficial and formative.

Lastman hopes to become mega-city's first mayor

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The first mayor of Toronto's megacity (according to polls) may well be short, fast-talking, flamboyant, wiry-haired and Jewish: Mel Lastman.

"I have more experience than anyone else. I make things happen, no matter what it is, no matter how impossible people said it would be," Lastman says. "Who else can sell the city better than I can?"

Lastman says his job as North York mayor has become "obsolete," because, he says, he has performed so well for the record 10 terms he's served since 1972.

"This city can do without me," he tells The CJN, "because I've organized it so well."

The latest Toronto Star poll put him well ahead of the only other major contender, Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall. Lastman was the early favorite for mega-mayor among 54 percent of respondents, compared to 25 percent support for Hall. The rest said they didn't know, or gave no answer.

Not too shabby for a high school dropout, the son of a poor hat-maker from Kensington Market, whose showbiz-like shtick seems to appeal to Metro residents. The stories are the stuff of urban legend: the flashy clothes, the self-deprecating pokes about his height and hair, the selling of a fridge in the Arctic, the garish ads for the Bad Boy furniture chain he founded ...As the New York Times put it in a recent profile: "In the annals of carny barkers and pitchmen, there is a special place reserved for Mel Lastman."

For most politicians, that would not be a complement. But for Lastman, now 64, it's translated into political gold. A 1994 survey showed he was one of the most recognized names and had the highest approval ratings of any mayor at the time in the Greater Toronto Area.

He peppers his speeches with Yiddishisms and can't say anything, it seems, without a jibe at his 5-foot-6-inch self ("Can you all hear me? Can you see me?") The perennial salesman claims credit for a host of successes in North York: The gleaming "downtown," the hard-won Sheppard Avenue subway line, the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, the low taxes. He calls his city "a well-oiled machine."

Now, he wants to make history as the first mayor of the megacity, with no predecessors and no blueprint. Lastman's unfazed.

"I can make it work," he says flatly. "There's no plan. The province has not done a darn thing about laying out a plan. All they've done was figure out how they can download [services] and pull money out of it. And we need someone with business experience who can get things together.

"This has never been done before. You've had mergers before, like in New York City, but you've never had getting rid of six municipalities and one regional government, and forming a whole new government."

And who better, he asks, to administer a budget that will exceed $6 billion — more than the budgets of six provinces — and a population of nearly three million?

Lastman isn't shy about listing his accomplishments: zero tax increases for the past five years, a $175-million surplus, twice-weekly garbage pickup, and "no one removes snow the way North York does."

Indeed, his record is impressive. He established Canada's first municipal committees on race relations, child and elder abuse and drinking and driving, helped set up CARD, an organization that works with disabled kids on horseback, and single-handedly drove the $1.2 billion Sheppard subway line through Metro council.

Lastman says he's encountering "phenomenal... unbelievable" support from voters across Metro. He sees no conflict in the fact that he was an early and vocal opponent of the megacity's creation, and is now the leading contender to run it.

"I'm not a booster," he insists. "But I will be, once I'm elected. I've accepted it and now, we've got to make it work. I'll take it on as a challenge, and make it work. I don't give up on anything. I don't know how to give up. I'll fight until I get it. And if I don't get it today, I'll get it next week. Or next year."

So is the megacity good for the Jews or bad for the Jews? Lastman doesn't pause. "It can't be bad!"

Rabbinic Reflections

Kindness an essential element of Judaism

By RABBI AVRAHAM PLOTKIN

One of the central themes of Judaism is saying "thank you." Recognition of a kindness and being thankful for that kindness might seem like basic decency to most, yet Judaism and Torah have found it essential to include it in every aspect of our daily rituals and conduct, to reinforce this important principle.

The moment we wake up in the morning we are instructed to say Modeh ani, thanking G-d for restoring our soul and granting us another day of life. Our daily prayers are replete with thank yous and recognition of the kindness of G-d. Every time we eat, we thank G-d for food, and when a person survives a dangerous situation, a special blessing is made, usually when the Torah is read, called Hagomel, thanking G-d for bestowing his kindness upon the unworthy.

Yet, notwithstanding the importance of the verbal thank you, there is a higher form of thanking – one accompanied by action, which is demonstrated by the mitzvah of bikkurim. Upon entering the land of Israel, the Jewish people were commanded to take of the first fruit as an expression of thanks, place them in a basket and present them to the cohen. This mitzvah teaches us that verbal thanks must also be accompanied by a tangible action.

In real life, many of us are prepared to offer thanks to a friend who has done us a kindness, but are not ready to reciprocate with a similar act of kindness when this same friend is in need. The mitzvah of bikkurim teaches us that "talk is cheap" when compared to action. It teaches us to give of our first fruits when offering thanks and appreciation. The Torah demands of us to live a higher level of decency and mentshlechkeit (humanity), not only to be well mannered and polite, but also to reciprocate with action.

Even something as important as thank you can become mechanical and meaningless when it is not translated into a tangible act of kindness. How often do we see parents concerned about etiquette and manners telling their children, after showering them with gifts, "What do you say? Thank you!" (The parents usually answer their own question.)

This form of thanking can be a meaningless exercise, if the child is not taught to show appreciation for the gift with an appropriate action, whether it be an improvement in behavior or reciprocating with a gift to the parent.

The same applies to the thank yous that we offer to G-d. Many of us, after experiencing a kindness from HaShem, ranging from simchahs to good health or prosperity, will offer heartfelt thanks to HaShem in shul. Of course, this natural expression of gratitude is very important, but it is only a first step in the Jewish approach to thanks. Judaism views thanks that is not followed by action as ringing hollow.

Our thanks to G-d must be followed by an action or mitzvah, which shows that we are truly sincere about our thanks. We must give something back to G-d in return for the kindness that we have received. The Lubavitcher Rebbe used to suggest to many of the countless people he counselled that they take upon themselves the fulfilment of a new mitzvah (good deed) as a first step in receiving the blessing of G-d. Wouldn't it be a wonderful idea to give back to G-d a good deed or a commitment to begin observing a mitzvah as a form of saying thank you? After all, that is the Jewish way of saying thank you.

Somber future seen for Diaspora Jews

Faith Or Fear. How Jews Can Survive In a Christian America*, by Elliott Abrams (Simon & Schuster, $34).

The hottest topic on the Jewish communal agenda these days is continuity. Will North American Jews remain a viable group after the next generation? What must be done to stanch the hemorrhage of Jewish loyalty and affiliation?

Elliott Abrams served as U.S. assistant secretary of State from 1981 to 1989 and is now regarded as a leading neo-conservative spokesperson. In this closely reasoned analysis he grapples with the crisis in the community and paints a dark and somber picture of tomorrow.

Fifty years ago Jews constituted almost four percent of the American population. Today this figure has plunged to two percent. Despite substantial growth in the general population, the Jewish numbers have remained static at around 5½ million. Of this number, however, over a million say that they have no religious or cultural ties to Judaism. Moreover, a majority of North American Jews now marry non-Jews and only one in four of these intermarried homes rears its children with a primary Jewish identity.

In Canada the intermarriage rate is somewhat less than across the border and synagogue affiliation higher. But, alarmingly, Canada's Jewish population before long will decline to an insignificant one percent of the population.

It is instructive to compare some of Abrams' basic ideas with those of Alan Dershowitz, whose recent book, The Vanishing American Jew, (reviewed in this space some weeks ago) dealt with a similar theme. Dershowitz believes that most Jews in North America adhere to valuable ethnic loyalty that is comprised of nostalgia, distinctive ideals and a singular cultural heritage. He asks, "Why has the Jewish background or heritage of so many individuals who have contributed so much to the world been so important to their success, while the core of Jewish religious observance has been relatively unimportant?"

Abrams, on the other hand, sees little hope for a Jewish future that is not religious in nature. He states "Whether American Jews can commit themselves anew to the goal of survival, to reversing the demographic patterns that threaten their collective future, depends on whether they still believe they are above all else, members of a religious community. As an ethnic, cultural, or political entity they are doomed."

Dershowitz, a civil libertarian, is convinced that American Jews must continue to fight for the complete separation of church and state. Not so, Abrams, who holds that Jews have much to gain from the emergence of a new brand of Christian belief that is philo-semitic and strongly pro-Israel. Preoccupation with anti-Semitism has led Jews to a radical secularism that has helped to create an amoral American and a de-judaised Jewry.

Both authors believe that Orthodoxy in its extreme form, with its willingness to separate from modern culture has the best chance among Jewish groups for survival. But they agree that Orthodoxy is not an option for the vast majority of North American Jews. What is necessary, evidently, is a new form of non-Orthodox religiosity.

Both of these books engender pessimism. But assuredly, positive factors for survival have been overlooked or downplayed.

Concern is necessary, but despair is not warranted. The game is far from over — a "saving remnant," if not a larger group, will endure.

Biz & Halachah

Trying to balance free enterprise with need for a caring spirit

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

Jewish law generally favors increased competition in the marketplace. Actively taking away business from someone else, however, is a different matter. Jewish law proscribes snatching away an anticipated gain from someone else who has rightfully earned it. The Talmud (Kidushuin 59a) teaches us that if one is in the process of acquiring something and a second person comes and snatches it away – while no legal recourse is available – he is labeled a rasha, an evil person.

In codifying this law, Maimonides gives an example of a person who gives money to a messenger to purchase land on his behalf. The messenger, upon seeing the property, decides to buy it for himself. The messenger has misused the trust placed in him and has snatched property away from its rightful purchaser.

In another application of this principle, the Talmud rules that a fisherman must not place his bait and net in a desired spot if bait has already been cast in the area by a prior fisherman. The original fisherman rightfully anticipates catching the fish and by putting your bait too close to his, you effectively steal his anticipated gain. In contrast, a business firm may locate in close proximity to the competition as here, customers are not forced to go to the newcomer, but can choose whom they would like to patronize.

Similarly, if one is involved in negotiation and the talks are ongoing, a second party is morally enjoined from entering the fray. Therefore, if someone has put an offer in to purchase a house and the seller has not rejected the offer but proposed a counter offer, a third party would not be allowed at this point to put in an offer. To do so would be improper interference.

Stealing clients from your competition is prohibited

In fact Rabbi Moshe Feinstein ruled that even if the second party was unaware of the original offer, he must withdraw his offer when he is made aware of the original offer. The case with which he dealt involved a miscommunication between a prospective employer and employee. Each thought the other would contact them if they were interested in the job. After not hearing from the potential employee, the employer mistakenly assumed the applicant was not interested and hired a second person. When the facts were clarified, Rabbi Feinstein ruled that the second person should defer and let the first prospective employee have the job.

The injunction against "snatching" also applies in the labor market, as can be seen from the following example. It has always been common practice for people to hire private tutors to teach their children. Once a parent has selected a particular teacher, Jewish law prohibits competing teachers from offering their services to the parents. Only when the parents express a desire to hire a different teacher could the second teacher's services be offered.

This seems to indicate that stealing clients from your competition is prohibited. For example, if a business has been using a particular firm of chartered accountants, it would be improper for another accounting firm to call the client and "introduce" themselves. Of course if the client has expressed an interest in possibly switching firms, one can then try one's best to attract that particular client.

By encouraging increased competition yet limiting the "raiding" of existing businesses, Jewish law tries to find a balance between free enterprise and a caring spirit.

Please understand that with thousands of Jewish sites out there, I am bound to miss some of your favorites. So e-mail me the Web sites name and address, and a short explanation of why you like to surf there. I don't have any major appliances or other prizes to give away, but if I do use your selection in a future column, you'll get full credit.

I never would have guessed that a site written for the World Zionist Organization could be so hip. Holidays with a Twist [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/holidays.htm] is a series of sometimes provocative essays on the major holidays. Even the titles are fun: You Don't Have a Prayer for Yom Kippur, A Pyro's Dream Come True for Chanukah, And the Beet Goes on... A Guide to the Gastronomic Trauma of Pesach.

Speaking of food, if you're putting together your menus for the holidays and are looking for something a bit different, here are a couple great kosher cooking sites. The massive Jewish Food Recipe Archives [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/] contains over 3,000 recipes. Everything from Bubbe's Chicken Soup [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/chknsp05.htm] to (believe it or not) Yogurt Curry Cholent [http://www.eskimo.com/~jeffree/recipes/yogchol.htm].

If I had to choose a couple of the best kashrut sites, they would be American-Asian Kashrus Services [http://www.kashrus.org/] and the Jewish Communication Network's Food Page [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Index.

These wonderful sites cover both basic and advanced concepts of kashrut. (Yes, porkfish really is kosher!)

These pages also include essays on everything from the challenges of becoming kosher to articles on kosher organic living.

The end of the year is near and that means it's time to buy a new calendar. Internet calendars still aren't as pretty as the ones in the store but they can be extremely handy. There are many Jewish Calendar conversion sites on the Internet but my favorite is the Havienu L'Shalom Hebrew Calendar [http://www.havienu.org/resrcs/hebcal.html]. This amazing program starts by asking what year you are looking for, where you live, whether the Hebrew words should be written in "Ashkenazis" or "Sephardit." You can choose from all the major Jewish centres, and if you want, get candlelighting times for Malmoe, Sweden and Colombo, Sri Lanka. Match that, Judaica store calendar!

Next week, more of the best.

Super Sunday Launches Super September

WHAT A WEEK!

It's been a $2 million week for UJA Federation, beginning with Super Sunday, September 14.

While the weather outside was picture perfect on Sunday, hundreds of volunteers were inside dialing up a storm and acquiring new gifts from 6,000 contributors. Together with nightly Super Week telethons that followed Super Sunday, UJA Federation raised about $2 million.

Super Sunday totals starting adding up quickly. By 11:30 a.m., campaigners had rung up more than $600,000 in campaign contributions on behalf of Jews in need. By 9:00 p.m., as the last few calls were being made, UJA Federation's annual campaign total to date had jumped to over $23 million.

"The sun might be shining outside," noted Jeff Cohen, who co-chaired Super Sunday with Vicki Campbell, "but nothing beats the energy and excitement being generated in this room."

Cohen was particularly pleased by the presence of representatives from nearly 50 agencies and organizations supporting UJA Federation. "Everybody is so motivated and willing to help out," said Cohen. "This is what community is all about," added Campbell.

For the second year, UJA Federation's Women's Campaign increased its number of Super Sunday campaigners through its successful mentoring program in which new recruits are matched with veteran volunteers.

Mentoring team captain Heather Rakhsha, said she was "proud to be a part of a community that cares so much. "Being here today makes me realize how fortunate we really are and how important it is to give something back."

First-timer Celia Bobkin, also a member of the mentoring teams, said she felt "very proud when I told my son where I was going this morning."

School teacher Chava Benaiah has been a regular at Super Sunday for eight years and will keep coming back as long as she can. "It's my way of saying thank you to UJA Federation for supporting our Jewish education system," she explained.

"Each phone yields huge returns," noted UJA Federation Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar, who was also pleased by the large volunteer turnout. "I'm very proud to see so many people interested in helping out."

Gary Grundman, who is heading UJA Federation's drive for New Gifts with Rosanne Ain, says he hopes the momentum from Super Sunday will carry through the entire month of September. "Our timing couldn't be more perfect to begin reaching new contributors."

Super Week will be followed by a New Gifts telethon on Sunday, September 28. To sign up for a shift call (416) 635- 2883 ext 155.

MORE WONDERFUN

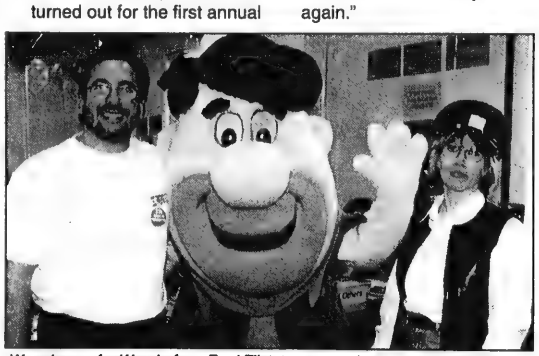
Food, fun and plenty of entertainment for the entire family await thousands of community members as UJA Federation and Paramount Canada's Wonderland prepare for the second annual Jewish Community Wonderfun Day this coming Sunday, September 21.

Tickets for Wonderfun Day at $18 a person – half the regular price – with children under three admitted free, can be purchased by calling the UJA Federation hotline at (416) 631-5700.

In addition to Wonderland's 160 attractions and 50 rides, fun seekers will be treated to a kosher barbeque in the Kings Courtyard and a live line-up of entertainment including Corey Mandell Entertainment at 11:00 a.m., the Associated Day School Choir at 12:00 p.m., and a performance by the Stars Band at 1:00 p.m. A special UJA Federation interactive Island celebration will be held at the International Showplace at 2:00 p.m. The Radio Show's Phil Kravetsky will be broadcasting live from Wonderland all day.

Last year more than 2,000 community members turned out for the first annual Jewish Community Wonderfun Day at the park.

"Paramount Canada's Wonderland is looking forward to continuing the momentum," says Sharon McBride, assistant manager of public relations and special events. "This event is already gearing up to be a tremendous success yet again."



Warming up for Wonderfun. Fred Flintstone came by to personally invite campaigners to Jewish Community Wonderfun Day at Paramount Canada's Wonderland, Sunday, September 21.

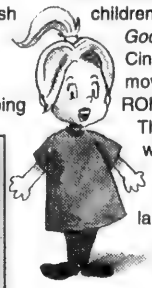
YOUNGSTERS CREATE MITZVA MAGIC

Eleven young artists were recently chosen as winners of junior UJA's first Mitzva Magic art contest.

The winners, ages 4 to 12, were invited to submit drawings depicting Jewish mitzvot – acts of goodness, such as giving tzedakah, lighting the Shabbat candles or helping to feed the hungry. More than 50 submissions were considered.

Prizes included Toronto Raptors tickets, passes to visit the set of the popular children's television show Goosebumps, Cineplex Odeon movie passes and CD ROMs.



The original works were displayed at UJA Federation's 1998 Campaign launch at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

Junior UJA is a pioneering project of UJA Federation created to expose Jewish children to the mitzva of tzedakah. Junior UJA's more than 2,000 members receive full colour newsletters, invitations to holiday celebrations and much more.

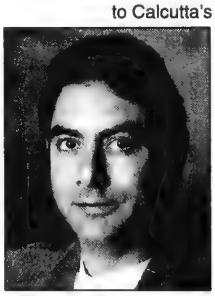
The Arts & Entertainment Team

Ellis Jacob and Jeff Rayman have been very successful behind the scenes of Canada's entertainment business. Now they're helping UJA Federation and its commitment to people in need take the spotlight.

Rayman, President of Alliance Equicap and Jacob, Executive Vice-President of Cineplex Odeon, are chairing UJA Federation's growing Arts and Entertainment division, which raised more than $800,000 for last year's campaign.



Jeff Rayman

Ellis Jacob

Although Rayman and Jacob have been long time UJA Federation contributors, the two decided to fast forward their campaign involvement after participating in last year's highly successful A&E Spotlight on Israel mission to Israel and Jordan.

"When I saw first hand all the ways UJA Federation helps Jews, I wanted to do more," explains Jacob, who was born in Calcutta and moved to Canada in 1969. Jacob still recalls his father's deep commitment to Calcutta's Jewish community and the rich Jewish life his family led.

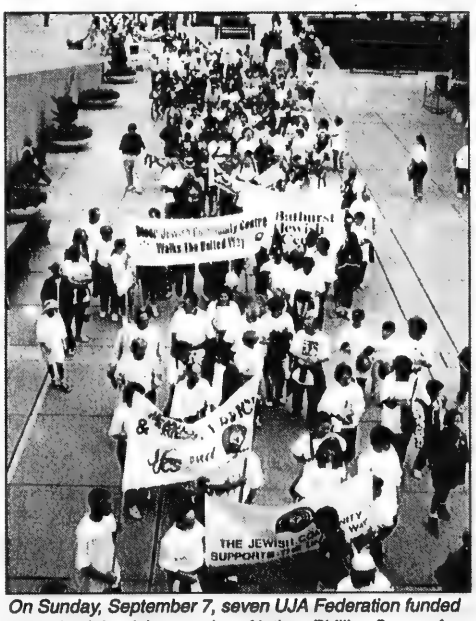
"Coming from a different background and knowing how Jews live on the other side of the world, gives me a real appreciation of shared Jewish values and heritage," he adds. "We are all responsible for each other."

Rayman agrees and says he's willing to "do whatever I can" to bring new donors on board. Both he and Jacob believe the creation of sub-divisions within the A&E division will help campaigners reach more potential contributors.

"Last year's A&E mission reinforced my belief in UJA Federation and the causes it supports," says Rayman. "Your one contribution can help in so many different ways."

Rayman hopes to repeat the division's success during last year's campaign, which brought in more than 125 new donors. He and Jacob are planning an A&E mission to Los Angeles in early February and another Business of Entertainment event featuring some of the biggest names in Canada's entertainment industry.

United We Walk



On Sunday, September 7, seven UJA Federation funded agencies joined thousands at Nathan Phillips Square for the 1997 United Way Walkathon. Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, Jewish Vocational Services, Bathurst Jewish Centre, Bloor Jewish Community Centre, Jewish Family and Child Service and UJA Federation participated in the four kilometre trek.

Family reunion draws over 130 members

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 130 members of a family that boasts almost 350 descendants gathered recently for its first-ever family reunion.

Descendants of the seven children of Mona Kreina Kozhemyak Ovseyovin, who ranged in age from seven weeks to 89 years old met, some for the first time in 50 years, at the Reena Camp in Orangeville.

Plans for the reunion began last winter when Harvey Glasner of Thornhill met cousin Ferne Mittleman of Buffalo, co-founder of the Jewish Genealogy Society of Buffalo. She had contacted him after seeing his name as a new member listed in Shem Tov, the newsletter of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada. She told him of the extensive family he was not aware of having and plans took off from there.

They formed a committee of cousins who sought names, addresses and photographs and made color-coded name tags corresponding to the different branches of the family.

Its history, many cousins learned from a display of photographs and a 27-foot, eight-generation computerized family tree prepared by Mittleman, began in Pagir, Lithuania, where the Feinberg/Fienberg/Fineberg children were born. (The name had different spellings after family members left Lithuania.) Ovseyovin, a widow, arrived in Toronto in 1905 with her family.

Relatives from as far away as Dallas, California and Vancouver have made tentative plans to meet again next year, when two cousins celebrate their 90th birthdays.

Canadian Masons visit Jerusalem

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For the first time in the history of Masonry, Canadian members of the Grand Lodge of Canada, in Ontario, attended meetings of the Grand Lodge of the State of Israel in Jerusalem.

Of the 102 Grand Lodge jurisdictions recognized by Israel, 64 were represented at the Jerusalem meetings.

Samuel Cohen, Masonic representative to the Grand Lodge of Israel, and Jonathan Kirshblum who at 25, was the youngest Mason present, participated in the program, which included a celebration in honor of the 3,000 anniversary of Jerusalem. Cohen and Kirshblum are members of Toronto's Mount Sinai Lodge.

Cohen says a ceremony took place in King Solomon's Quarries in Jerusalem where the Montefiore Lodge of Jerusalem was consecrated. Many of the Israeli Masons in the newly formed lodge were formerly from England.

"It was thrilling that the ceremony was held at the location where King Solomon quarried stones for the Temple," he says. "The Grand Master of Israel, Most Worshipful Brother Ephriam Fuchs, sat in the chair of King Solomon.

"This is where Masonry was founded, and to be touched by history was inspirational — it merged the past with the present."

Cohen says that although the rituals of the Masons are based on religious concepts — "the purest principals of piety and virtue," — it is not a religious organization.

He says Masonry "teaches us to be open to the realities of pluralism in our society. It teaches us tolerance and understanding."

Shared views

All discussions of political or religious beliefs are excluded. "We maintain that the spirit of unity and harmony characterizes our lodges."

Cohen brought fraternal greetings and best wishes to the Grand Lodge of Israel. He and Kirshblum met with Masons from all over the world including Australia, Hawaii, Scotland, Europe and the United States.

"We shared views and ideas, and discussed mutual problems facing Grand Lodges throughout the world.

"We made new friends, and having seen first hand how Masons throughout the world act towards each other, it epitomized for me the principles of Freemasonry — brotherly love, relief and truth."

Despite decades of war between Jews and Arabs, Cohen said, "it is reassuring that there still is a place where Jews and Arabs, Moslems and Christians can meet on the basis of fraternity and brotherly love with mutual respect for one another."

FOOD IDEAS FOR Rosh Hashanah

Traditional Mid-eastern dishes leave you satisfied

Chicken is one of the most popular holiday foods, especially these days, when it is appreciated for being low in fat, high in food value and versatile.

Empire Kosher, an American firm that has been supplying kosher frozen poultry products for nearly 60 years, has published a calendar for 5788, called Timeless Recipes for Year-Round Healthful Living. Besides some great poultry recipes, it includes candle lighting times for many cities, including Toronto and Montreal.

Here are two samples from the calendar:

MOROCCAN CHICKEN

4 lbs. chicken, cut up
½-¾ cup matzah meal
oil
1 cup chicken broth
2-3 cups chopped onion ground cinnamon to taste
1 tbsp. ground ginger
2 tbsp. grated lemon peel
2 tbsp. grated orange peel
2 cups pitted prunes
2 tbsp. lemon juice
red, green and yellow peppers, cut into long strips
¾ cup slivered almonds (garnish)

Preheat oven to 350.

Wash chicken pieces in ice water, and pat dry. Put matzah meal in large plastic bag or sealable plastic container. Place chicken pieces one at a time into meal, and shake until well coated.

Heat oil in frying pan. Brown chicken on all sides and remove to plate. Saute onion until tender in pan juices. Arrange chicken and onion in roaster. To chicken broth, add lemon juice, ginger and cinnamon. Pour over chicken. Bake for 25 to 30 minutes.

Add prunes and peels and bake 30 more minutes. If necessary, add more chicken broth or water to roasting pan. Five minutes before cooking time is complete, lay pepper strips over chicken. Sprinkle almonds on top.

Serve on a bed of seasoned rice or polenta.

(This is great for Pesach as well – serve over farfel.)

SWEET AND SOUR MEATBALLS

Meatballs
2 lbs. ground turkey
1 cup corn flake crumbs
1 to 2 onions, finely diced
1 clove garlic, crushed
2 eggs
2 tbsp. dried oregano and/or parsley flakes (opt.)
2 tsp. salt
½ tsp. (or more, to taste) pepper
½ tsp. nutmeg
½ tsp. cloves
¼ tsp. cayenne (opt.)
oil

Break meat into small pieces, and blend in eggs, one at a time. Add in all other ingredients except oil. Shape mixture into one-inch balls. Heat oil in large skillet. Brown meatballs, shaking the skillet often during cooking. (This helps the meatballs keep their round shape). Remove from skillet and drain on paper towels.

Sauce
1 can (19 oz.) pineapple tidbits
2 cups brown or yellow sugar
½ cup vinegar
3 tbsp. soy sauce
2 tbsp. cornstarch
½ cup cold water

In a pot big enough to hold all the meatballs, mix together the first four sauce ingredients. Simmer over medium heat until mixture begins to boil. Reduce heat immediately.

Completely dissolve cornstarch in cold water and add to sauce. Stir on medium heat until sauce starts to thicken and boil. Reduce heat. Add meatballs and stir until they are covered with sauce. Simmer until the meatballs are fully cooked.

Serve with steamed rice and asparagus.

The technology factor

One of the important amenities that signals a Jewish community's coming of age is a strong, central body to regulate kashrut. Toronto is one such city where the Kashruth Council of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, popularly known as COR, serves that function.

It was not always that way. In fact, so rancorous has the subject been over the years that at one time or another various sectors of the community did not talk to each other, or avoided eating food supervised by the "other" party, or insisted on eating only salads at an institution or function whose kashrut was certified by the "other" side.

Acceptance within the community of COR supervision is almost universal. However, there are still disagreements from time to time about the decisions that COR makes. Not everyone is satisfied with the status quo.

In part two of our three-part series, CJN staff reporter Leila Speisman examines the mandate and operation of COR.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rapidly changing food production technologies and rapidly changing attitudes among Jewish consumers are key features in the often-strained face of modern kashrut supervision.

This is the message from Rabbis Yitzchak Kerzner and Mordechai Levin, chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth and executive director of the Kashruth Council of Toronto respectively.

Kashrut supervisors must have a wide knowledge of the complexities of food technology and biochemistry, said Rabbi Levin, who himself is an expert in ingredients and flavors used in processed products.

The Kashruth Council is constantly being asked to expand its operations, but it has so far refused to stretch its staff and resources too far, as "we want to keep our standards high," Rabbi Levin said.

Kashrut in Toronto

Rabbi Levin directs a full time and part-time staff of approximately 75 people including 70 mashgichim among whom are five ordained rabbis. The mashgichim all have yeshivah training. After they are hired by COR they undergo additional training.

This additional training for the mashgichim, along with hashgachah and kashrut supervision are part of the responsibilities of the five ordained rabbis who are on COR's staff.

The mashgichim supervise cooking or manufacturing processes in over 400 industrial businesses and in hundreds of institutions and retail outlets.

The products whose manufacture they supervise range from tomato sauce to dish detergent, from cooking oil to vitamins. The process includes keeping files on all the ingredients used to prepare, process and preserve a product as well as any changes in those processes that manufacturers may introduce from time to time.

As well, the mashgiach has to make sure that the equipment used by the company in the manufacturing process is acceptable by halachic standards. For instance, a company may begin to process baked beans in the same equipment in which it processes pork and beans. Or it may consolidate all its potato chip manufacturing in one plant, rather than segregate the kosher chips from the non-kosher ones.

Rabbi Levin has travelled to Bangkok to supervise the packing of canned tuna. Even though tuna is a kosher fish, per se, care must be taken in its processing because some fish packers have been known to use dolphin, or other non-kosher fish in place of pure tuna.

Bakeries must be supervised to ensure the kashrut both of the product and of the process.

For example, an especially important requirement in the baking process is the taking of challah. Halachah demands that whenever a certain amount of flour is used in a recipe, some of it must be separated and burned in the oven. This practice was implemented to replicate somewhat the sacrifices in the Temple.

COR is not a profit-making organization. Income raised from supervision goes solely to pay the salaries of the mashgichim and administrative costs. Its overall budget is approximately $1 million annually.

The cost of supervision, Rabbi Levin explained, is related to the time allocated according to the demand and the needs of the specific product or process. For example, there are great differences between supervising a restaurant as opposed to a soap manufacturer, or the production of a complex product as opposed to a simple one, or a business involving meat as opposed to one involving dairy.

COR is autonomous from any other organization. "Decisions are made by the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth, and not by any other body," Rabbi Kerzner said.

COR tries to be understanding when a business finds paying its supervision fees to be a problem, and according to Rabbi Kerzner will wait until business improves. "But we can't compromise our standards."

The fees that COR charges companies for its supervision are related to the nature of the supervision required, which in turn depends upon the type of food processes employed by the company.

Industrial companies pay COR an annual base fee of between $1,000 and $2,000, depending on the size and complexity of the food-related prodcedures. This base fee does not include however, inspection fees and travel costs. Inspection fees are calculated on a per hour basis.

Retail companies also pay COR a base fee whose amount is based on a formula, the purpose of which is to cover the costs of the mashgiach at those premises.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Apples are ready for harvest for the holidays

The luscious summer peaches and berries are already starting to fade from our memories – but don't despair. The incredible Ontario apples are appearing on store shelves just in time.

Enjoy these delectable ideas from Foodland Ontario.

GRILLED CHICKEN AND APPLE POUCHES

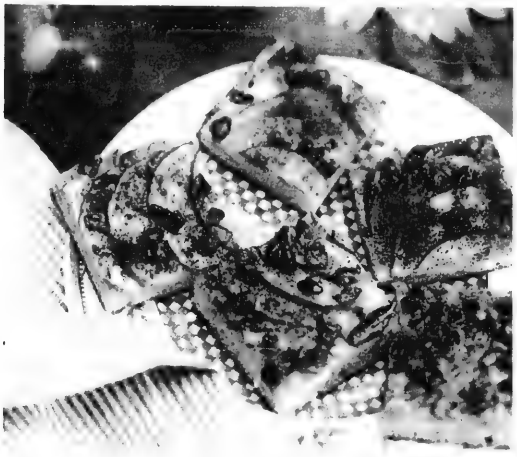
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 large onion, thinly sliced
3 medium apples, cored and sliced
¼ cup honey mustard
4 boneless skinless chicken breasts
½ tsp. dried basil
½ tsp. dried thyme
½ tsp. salt

In large skillet, heat oil over medium heat; sauté onion for 5 min. Add apples, cook 3 minutes.

Spread mustard over both sides of chicken. Place individually on 4 pieces of greased double thickness of foil. Sprinkle each with ⅛ tsp. basil, thyme and salt. Divide apple mixture among chicken. Wrap tightly, making 4 pouches.

Grill over medium-hot coals for about 30 minutes, turning pouches every 10 minutes, until chicken is no longer pink inside (or bake at 350 for 30 minutes).

To serve, remove chicken and apples from foil and place on plates; pour juices over top. Serves 4.



These simple apple dessert squares are so fun and easy to make that the kids will be clamoring, "Can we help?" A perfect, packable picnic or brown bag dessert featuring Ontario apples.

SIMPLE APPLE DESSERT SQUARES

1⅓ cups all-purpose flour
½ cup granulated sugar
1½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. nutmeg
⅓ cup milk
3 tbsp. butter or margarine, melted
1 egg
4 apples, cored and sliced
¼ cup chopped nuts

Topping:

¼ cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

In bowl, combine flour, sugar, baking powder, salt and nutmeg; mix in milk, butter and egg until smooth. Spread evenly in greased 13 x 9-inch baking dish. Arrange apples on top. Sprinkle with nuts.

Topping: Mix sugar with cinnamon; sprinkle on top. Bake at 350F for 45 minutes or until apples are tender. Cool in pan. Cut into squares.

Shift towards greater stringency

Some observers of COR's supervisory practices have noted a shift recently toward greater stringency in its approach.

When asked to comment Rabbi Levin told The CJN "Certain leniencies used to be necessary, because there was no choice. Now there is," he said.

This is not only the case in Toronto, Rabbis Levin and Kerzner agreed. "It is also true with the O-U (Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations) and all other major kashrut organizations," said Rabbi Kerzner.

Certain approaches may be legally correct, the rabbi said, but "may violate the spirit of the law. A legal loophole may violate a higher moral code." As well, the rabbi said, "we are living in a a time when the Jewish community has among its members, sophisticated, knowledgeable people, who are committed to the meticulous observance of kashrut, and demand the maximum standards. We try to accommodate them.

"That isn't infringing on anyone else's rights to be less exacting – it's striving for the highest standards."

For this reason, Rabbi Kerzner said, "only those rabbis with a commitment to Halachah in accordance with the Shulchan Aruch (the code of Jewish law) sit on the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth."

Shoppers are confronted with a wide range of products with unfamiliar hechshers. This accounts for some confusion. "It is impossible to know every one who supervises products. That is why we prefer to deal with organizations (like O-U, Chof-K, MK, Star-K, or the Chief Rabbinate of Israel.)"

On the subject of the letter "K" that appears on some foods, it is not a valid hechsher because there is no indication of who is responsible for enforcing it, they said.

In the final instalment of the series next week, we will examine the controversies surrounding some of COR's decisions.

POTATONICK

Sponge:
1 cup warm water
1½ pkgs. yeast
1½ cups flour

Dough:
¼ lb. potatoes, skin on
¼ cup chopped onion
2 slices bread, crumbled
½ cup bread or all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. ground black pepper
½ cup vegetable oil
2 beaten eggs
Shortening for greasing pan

In a large bowl sprinkle the yeast over the warm water and stir slightly. Add the 1½ cups of flour and mix until the mixture is smooth. Cover and set aside until it puffs up (about 20-25 minutes).

Stir down the dough. Scrub the potatoes, then grind or grate them with the skins on. Add the potatoes and onion to the dough and stir until blended. Add the bread crumbs, flour, salt, baking powder and ground pepper and mix well. Add the oil and egg and mix well. Split the mixture into 3 well greased 8- or 9-inch loaf pans. Leave room at the top for the potatonick to rise.

Place a bowl of water on the lowest rack of the oven and then preheat the oven to 350. Bake until the crust is brown and feels firm when gently pressed in the centre with your fingertips (about 1 hour). Let cool on a wire rack covered with a cloth for 5 minutes to allow the loaves to steam. Invert and tap out onto the rack. Serve warm. The Potatonick can be refrigerated for several days or frozen for 1 to 2 weeks. Reheat at 325 until warm, or it develops a hard crust if desired. Makes 3 loaves.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Breads have woven their way into our Yiddish hearts

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

One of the most basic and satisfying of foods to come out of a Jewish kitchen is bread. Challah, of course, is number 1 on the hit parade. Its significance in our life and life cycle events is undeniable. Recipes tend to be handed down from generation to generation and while they may vary slightly, they all are pretty much the same.

There are, however, a multitude of other breads that have woven their way into our collective Yiddish hearts (and mouths) and landed on our hips, as a result of our ancestors' proclivity for wandering from country to country, picking up recipes from wherever they managed to find a home. We may not have had a lot of permanent residences, but we had great bread.

Making bread is far easier than most people think. You need to follow a few simple guidelines and you shouldn't have any problems.

First, yeast is not the enemy. It's just a plant and it's really not too difficult to use once you realize that the temperature of the water used to activate the yeast should be between 105 and 115 degrees. Any cooler or hotter and you run the risk of not having it activate.

Letting the dough rise twice is also a must. The dough needs to form gluten (the structure of the bread), and letting it rise twice lets that happen.

RYE BREAD

2 tbsp. yeast
2½ cups water
¼ cup honey
1 tbsp. salt
2 tbsp. shortening, melted and cooled slightly
2½ cups rye flour
2 tbsp. caraway seeds
6 cups flour

In a bowl combine the water, honey and yeast. When the yeast bubbles add the salt and shortening. Mix well. Add the rye flour and caraway seeds. Add enough white flour to form a soft dough. Knead for about 5 minutes and add more flour if the dough is too soft and sticky.

Place the dough in a greased bowl and cover. Let rise until the dough is double in size. Punch the dough down and place the dough on a floured surface. Kneed 3 or 4 times and shape into two free form loaves and let rise until double in size. Preheat oven to 400. Take a sharp knife and make several criss cross cuts across the top of the loafs. Bake for 35 minutes. You can glaze with water just before and after baking if you like. Makes two loaves.

BLACK BREAD

⅛ cup cornmeal
¼ cup cold water
¼ cup boiling water
1 tbsp. butter
1 tbsp. salt
2 tbsp. brown sugar plus 1 tsp.
1½ tsp. caraway seeds
1 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa
1 tbsp. instant coffee
2 pkgs. yeast
¼ cup warm water
2 cups dark rye flour
1 cup whole wheat flour
2 cups flour
1 egg white beaten with 2 tbsp. water

In a bowl combine the cornmeal and the cold water and mix well. In a saucepan boil the water. Pour the cornmeal mixture into the boiling water and mix until the mixture thickens and bubbles. Stir in the butter, caraway seeds, cocoa and instant coffee. Remove from heat and cool slightly.

In another bowl dissolve the yeast in the ¼ cup water and add to the other mixture and stir. Place the liquid mixture into a large bowl or mixing bowl and gradually mix in the flours. Add a little more water if necessary. The dough should, however, be slightly sticky. Place the dough on a floured surface and knead with additional flour if necessary until the dough is firm and elastic. Place dough into a greased bowl and cover. Let rise until double in size.

Punch down and form two round loaves or place the dough in two greased loaf pans. Preheat oven to 375. Let rise until double in size and brush the top of the bread with the beaten egg whites and water mixture. Bake 375 for 50 to 60 minutes. Err on the side of overbaking if you have doubts about whether or not the bread is done. Makes 2 loaves.

Breads are a true slice of life

PUMPERNICKEL BREAD

2 tbsp. yeast
1 tsp. sugar
½ cup lukewarm water
1½ tbsp. salt
¼ cup molasses
1 cup potatoes, mashed
1 tbsp. shortening
2 cups boiling water
1¼ tbsp. caramel coloring
½ cup yellow cornmeal
4 cups rye flour
2 tbsp. caraway seeds
5 cups flour

In a small bowl, combine the yeast with sugar and warm water. Set aside. In a large bowl combine the salt, molasses, mashed potatoes and shortening. Pour the boiling water over these ingredients and mix well. Cool. When the potato mixture is lukewarm add the yeast mixture to it and mix. Stir in the coloring to the desired color.

Combine the cornmeal with the rye flour, caraway seeds and all but 1 cup of the white flour. Stir in the liquid to the flour mixture and mix well until it comes away from the side of the bow. Turn the dough out on to a floured board and knead with enough flour to form a soft dough. Cover and let rest for 20 minutes.

Knead again and add a little more flour if necessary and place the dough in a greased bowl. Cover and let rise until the dough is double in size. Punch the dough down, place the dough on a floured surface. Knead a few times and shape into two round loaves. Brush the top of the loaves with water, place the loaves on greased baking sheet and let rise until double in size. Bake at 350 for 50 minutes. Remove the loaves from the oven and cool on racks. Makes 2 loaves.

ONION BREAD

1 tsp. sugar
½ cup lukewarm water
2 pkgs. yeast
4 eggs
⅓ cup sugar
1 tbsp. salt
⅔ cup oil
1¼ cups warm water
8 cups flour (approx.)
2 grated onions
1 tbsp. salt
½ cup poppy seeds
½ cup melted butter or margarine

In a small bowl dissolve sugar in the ½ cup water. Sprinkle the yeast on top (let set 10 minutes). Mix in the eggs, sugar, 2 tbsps. salt, oil, water and half of the flour. Mix well and add the rest of the flour. Let the dough rise for about 30 to 40 minutes and punch down.

Divide the dough into 3 portions and roll each section out to about ½-inch thick (sort of like a pizza). Prick the top with a fork and place on greased cookie sheet. Preheat oven to 400 and let the dough rise 10 to 15 minutes. In a small bowl combine the remaining ingredients. Divide the onion/poppy seed mixture between the three loaves and spread it over the top. Bake 20 minutes and cool slightly before serving. Makes 3 loaves.

Supermarket planned for Lawrence Plaza

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A huge supermarket, with half its space devoted to kosher goods, is scheduled to open in Lawrence Plaza before the end of this year.

The Dominion store is to be located in the space formerly occupied by Sportmart.

The supermarket, owned by the A&P chain, is to occupy 40,000 square feet, said Roger Hebert, site manager.

It marks the return of a large supermarket to the busy Lawrence and Bathurst plaza, which has been without one since Loblaws left several years ago.

Some people worry about our Jewish future.

We're preparing for it.

A Jewish education for our children is the best way to preserve our values and traditions. That's why education is UJA Federation's single largest local expenditure. Our Board of Jewish Education helps parents pay tuition fees and trains teachers for one of North America's most extensive Jewish school systems. The power to protect our Jewish future is in your hands. Jewish education is at the heart of our sacred responsibility for one people around the world. Please share that responsibility by supporting the UJA Federation Campaign.

Shir Libeynu to hold services at Cecil Community Centre

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Shir Libeynu could not have selected a more appropriate location than the Cecil Community Centre, with its marble yahrzeit plaques, Cantonese language classes and fundraising events, to hold its second annual High Holy Day services.

Founded by Adrienne Rosen, a philosophy major and doctoral candidate, and Aviva Goldberg, a doctoral candidate in York University's Women Studies Department, Shir Libeynu (Song of Our Heart) is a left-wing, progressive, egalitarian congregation that aims at merging Hebrew prayer with Jewish spirituality and social consciousness.

"Our mission statement is that we are unaffiliated, we are egalitarian, we believe in participation and we believe in keeping the traditions, but innovating [them] as well," says Goldberg.

And it is precisely this commitment to preserving Jewish customs while accommodating modern-day diversity that makes Shir Libeynu's choice of venue this year so fitting. Built in 1890, the Cecil Community Centre originally functioned as the Church of Christ. However, in the 1920s, the Jewish Ostrovitzer congregation acquired the building, truncated its bell tower and capped it with a dome. Located in the Kensington Market area, the building remained a synagogue through the years, serving the neighborhood's thriving Jewish community.

In the 1960s, the Ostrovitzer congregation sold the building but stipulated that neither the Hebrew date-stones nor the massive marble yahrzeit plaques in the vestibule could be tampered with, as had happened when the neighboring Beth Jacob synagogue was sold.

Today, the building serves an area that has become predominantly Chinese.

"It's magical. You turn out the lights and you sit down when no one's in there and you can hear the voices of the past," says Rosen of the former synagogue whose women's section now serves as second-storey office space.

Gay and lesbian families, single parents and intermarried couples are all invited to attend Shir Libeynu's High Holy Day services and the shul will be offering free day care facilities.

"We're totally committed to diversity and pluralism in the Jewish community. We don't want to know what kind of Jew you are ...we're not going to judge your Judaism. We just want you to be Jewish and involved in any way that you can be," says Rosen.

In an effort to facilitate the myriad beliefs and practices of its expected 250 Jewish attendees, Shir Libeynu's High Holy Day services will feature group aliyot, Hebrew prayers, songs and niggunim in non-gendered English translations, and a supplement containing poetry, prose and meditative readings. The singing of Hebrew prayers will be led by Sharon Bar-David, an Israeli-born chazzan.

Shir Libeynu's innovative approach to Jewish traditions and contemporary lifestyles extends beyond its annual High Holy Day services. In celebration of Shavuot, Shir Libeynu rented a bus and brought a group of women from a seniors' home to Casino Rama in order to commemorate the relationship between two generations of women. And on Sukkot, the shul built a sukkah in a residential downtown neighborhood and invited friends and family to attend a brief service.

Tickets can be purchased by calling the Shir Libeynu Hotline: 537-3435 or by purchasing directly from the Bloor J.C.C.

Information night at mikveh

TORONTO — For the third year, the Thornhill Community Mikveh is holding an information night, Sept. 25 at 7:30 p.m.

Open to all Jews, and to women and men, separately, this mikvah is used mostly for conversions, by brides and just before the High Holy Days, according to Catherine Bianco, its shomerit.

The session will cover the role of the mikvah in the Liberal community. It will be open for immersion that night. The usual charge of $18 will apply.

These information sessions have attracted 25 to 30 people in the past, mostly women.

"It is a particularly meaningful ritual for men and women prior to the holidays," said Bianco.

It is located at 36 Atkinson Ave. in Thornhill. For information, call 905-709-2275.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

צל כבד:

צל כבד יורד על הארץ הקטנה שלנו. פתאום מתברר שגייסות בלתי מוגבלים של אנשי חאמאס מוכנים לפוצץ את עצמם ובלבד שיהרגו יהודים. התגובה המיידית של הישראלים: צריך להפסיק את תהליך השלום, עראפאת לא מספיק מעוניין לדכא את החאמאס. אבל תחשבו על זה: אנשי החאמאס מתפוצצים בדיוק כדי שלא יהיה שלום. ולגבי עראפאת- לפני שנתיים היו פיצוצים דומים כשאנחנו שלטנו בכל הגדה וגם אז לא הצלחנו לסכל אותם. ורצועת הביטחון בלבנון: היא אמורה להגן מפני החיזבאללה, אבל מתי שהם רק רוצים הם יורים קטיושות וכל שבוע נהרגים שם חיילים יהודים, בדיוק כמו שנהרגו קודם בעזה. וככל שגדל ומתעצם מעגל האיבה, גם המתונים שבמחנה הישראלי אינם רואים עוד שלום. "לא שלום כזה" הם אומרים, "ולא עם אחד כמו עראפאת". אז עם מי כן שלום? עם קנדה? עם ניו זילנד? לפני חודשיים, כשהותקף נתניהו בכנסת על המדיניות שלו הוא ענה: הינה הבאתי לכם רגיעה בטרור. לא נקף יום והיה פיצוץ בשוק מחנה יהודה. לא הביא ולא בָּטיח. והאם שלום ונסיגה מהגדה יביאו שלום? איך אפשר לדעת?

בקיצור, מה דעתכם שלכם? תכתבו נא, ואני מבטיח לפרסם.

לפני עשרים שנה נפטרה המשוררת תרצה אתר, והיא רק בת שלושים ושבע שנה. גם אם אינכם קוראים שירה בודאי תזכרו את השיר הראשון שפירסם את שלמה ארצי "אהבתיה" (היא בליבי עכשיו... כמו הרבה מילים... עכשיו היא כאן") - את השיר הזה כתבה תרצה אתר. אתר היתה ביתו של המשורר נתן אלתרמן ולה הוא כתב את "שיר משמר" הידוע "שמרי נפשך, כוחך שמרי, שמרי נפשך" והיא לא שמרה, ונפטרה בצורה טראגית פחות מעשר שנים אחריו. ספר השירים של תרצה אתר מלווה אותי כבר שנים רבות, וכדי לעשות לכם טעם של עוד, הינה כמה שורות שישארו איתכם:

"לא תמיד הדמעות מסמרות על תגר,
יש דברים אחרים,
-השתיקה, הזמן, יש-אין-יש;
הסומק עולה בלחיי האנשים
לא תמיד מבושה,
-לפעמים כשוט אש!"

פיתרון החידה: הניסוי הראשון בתנ"ך:

לפני שבועיים שאלתי אתכם מה היה הניסוי המבוקר הראשון בתנ"ך ואולי בהיסטוריה. "ניסוי מבוקר" הוא כזה שיש בו "קבוצת ביקורת", כלומר: מנסים פעם אחת, ואח"כ עוד פעם בתנאים שונים. למשל: פעם אחת נותנים תרופה אחת ופעם שניה תרופה אחֶרֶת.

רוב התשובות שקיבלנו היו לא נכונות. שתיים היו מעניינות אם כי לא מה שאני חשבתי: " לגידי שלום, התשובה לחידה היא: נוח, העורב והיונה. צופיה קליין טורונטו". נוח שלח את העורב לנסות אם ירדו המים, ואח"כ את היונה, שחזרה עם עלה זית ואח"כ לא חזרה. רעיון יפה. חיים פרוכטר ממונטריאול ענה תשובה מעניינת ושונה: "הניסוי הראשון בתנ"ך היה שילוח המרגלים. זה היה גם ניסוי וגם ניסיון, [illegible] קופה של יהושע לפני כיבוש הארץ שוב חזרו על אותו ניסיון". ולמה אני התכוונתי? - כשציווה מלאך ה' על גדעון להנהיג את ישראל, רצה גדעון הוכחה שאכן האל ייתן בידו את המדיינים. הוא ביקש מהמלאך סימן, וציוה עליו לעשות שעם שחר תהיה גיזת הצמר מלאה טל ושהכל מסביב יהיה יבש. המלאך צייית. למחרת ביקש גדעון שיתהפך על המעשה, רק שהפעם יהיה הכל מסביב רטוב מטל, ורק הגיזה תישאר יבשה. וכך היה. מברוק לצופיה וחיים, הם זוכים בספר "The Children of Neverland" שנשלח לביתם עם הקדשת המחבר.

Canada's rights charter influences Israeli law

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Charter of Rights and Freedoms has had a tremendous effect on Canadian society since it was introduced in 1982, but those who framed the constitutional document might be surprised to learn that it has had almost as great an impact in Israel.

Familiarity with the charter is essential for barristers practising Israeli law, since courts in the Jewish state often refer to Canadian legal decisions when delivering their own judgments, a visiting Israeli civil rights expert said recently.

Moshe Cohen, a lawyer with the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), said the Canadian charter has become "tremendously important" for Israeli society since the enactment of that country's Basic Law, which sets out fundamental rights pertaining to life, property and human dignity. Canadian cases are considered by Israeli courts when they apply those principles to local circumstances.

Like Canada's charter, the Basic Law has a section that makes all rights subject to reasonable limitations. Israeli courts have studied Canadian Supreme Court decisions, particularly R. v. Oakes, to determine the criteria by which to limit those fundamental rights, Cohen said.

Despite the enactment of the Basic Law and the influence of Canadian jurisprudence, Israel at best is in the middle of the pack of the international community when it comes to protecting human rights, he said.

The absence of separation between "church and state" and the broad authority given the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service, are the main reasons for downgrading Israel's ranking on human rights, he said.

Because of the influence of religious parties, discrimination is permitted against non-Orthodox streams of Judaism, while secular Jews are forced to comply with religious rules in matters such as marriage and divorce. Both circumstances violate an individual's freedom of religion, Cohen said.

On the security issue, Palestinians and even right-wing activists suspected of passing army material to opponents of the government have been roughed up by the security force.

"One of Israel's biggest problems is [this] huge power, operating secretly... Security personnel have the authority to use moderate pressure on detainees. Sometimes they use too much," he said.

Cohen, who was in Toronto to research Canadian law, said ACRI is constantly attempting to expand the scope of human rights in Israel.

A recent book by Chief Justice Aharon Barak, in which the jurist suggests the protection of "human dignity" should include equality, freedom of speech and freedom of movement, which are not explicitly protected in the Basic Law, gives an indication of the direction in which the court is looking, Cohen said.

Moshe Cohen

That approach clashes with the view of Israel's Orthodox parties. From the earliest days of the state, the Orthodox have opposed provisions in Israeli law that would recognize the concepts of equality and freedom of speech, which could permit equal rights for women and, it was feared, allow displays of pornography. In recent years, Orthodox parties have tried to prevent a Reform Jewish woman from sitting on the Netanya religious council and have disputed the right of non-Orthodox streams to have their conversions recognized, he said.

ACRI, with the assistance of the New Israel Fund (NIF), works to encourage public debate on civil rights while lobbying the Knesset to expand recognized human rights, Cohen said.

In the past, ACRI has been hampered by the public perception that it is a left-wing group concerned only with Palestinian rights. But during the last Labor government, ACRI took on the cases involving Kach supporters and Ultra-Orthodox Jews who were attacked by police in anti-government demonstrations. In addition, ACRI represented Sephardi Jews in discrimination suits against the government.

"This has softened our image as a left-wing group," Cohen said.

While in Toronto, Cohen addressed a group of lawyers on human rights in Israel. The speaking engagement was sponsored by the NIF, which promotes the strengthening of democracy and advancing social justice in Israel. The NIF helps train Israeli lawyers in civil rights at North American law schools and finds placements for them in Israeli law firms. ACRI is the New Israel Fund's largest single recipient of financial support.

CLARIFICATION

In the Sept. 5 edition of The CJN, the figure for tuition at Ner Israel Yeshiva was given as $11,750. Ner Israel Yeshiva is the only high school in Toronto where the students live-in during the school year. Consequently, this figure includes tuition, room and board.

Brothers give $100,000 to promote Yiddish education

TORONTO — Two brothers have chose to commemorate their late mother's love of Yiddish by donating $100,000 toward Yiddish education.

Saul and Aaron Berman's gift on behalf of their mother Mary, who died recently in Calgary, is being made through UJA Federation's Legacy Campaign to promote Yiddish education in the Greater Toronto Area and beyond, with particular emphasis on children's education and teacher training.

"My mother struggled so hard to give my brother and me a good Yiddish education while raising us alone during the Depression," says Saul, who now lives in Toronto. "It was her means of ensuring our Yiddishkeit and now we want to continue her dream," adds Aaron, who remains in Calgary.

"One of my mother-in-law's greatest pleasures was listening to her grandchildren speak Yiddish," says Saul's wife Ana, who teaches Yiddish at Bialik Hebrew Day School. She is active in enlisting community support for Yiddish programs by UJA Federation's committee for Yiddish and Friends of Yiddish. "My children are able to enjoy a closer relationship with their grandparents because they are able to communicate in Yiddish."

"If we instil a love of Yiddish at a young age it will always be a part of their Jewish identity," says committee for Yiddish chair Ethel Cooper. "Yiddish is an essential element of Jewish continuity."

Morris Zbar, UJA Federation's vice-president of community planning and allocation assured the Bermans "their gift will go a long way to ensuring the stability of funding for Yiddish studies."

The Mary Berman Endowment Fund will be used to increase funding for new initiatives and existing committee for Yiddish programs, including Yiddish language classes for adults and children, and teacher training.

Yiddish scholarships won

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three students have been awarded scholarships in Yiddish through the University of Toronto.

Second-year U of T science student Nesya Goldberg, 19; retired physician Daniel Deitch, 75; and Tom Rachman, now a graduate student in New York, received respectively the Anne Medres Glass Memorial Scholarship in Yiddish, the Percy Matenko Scholarship in Yiddish and the Solomon Isaac Shek Award in Yiddish Literature.

"I took Yiddish for enjoyment and I really did enjoy it; to get a scholarship too was wonderful," said Goldberg, a graduate of Ulpanat Orot and a member of Netivot Hatorah Day School's second graduating class.

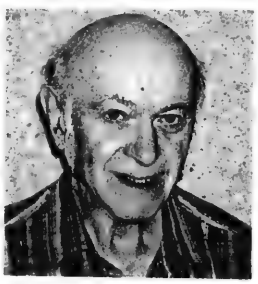
A second-generation Canadian whose parents spoke Yiddish when they didn't want her to understand, Goldberg thinks Yiddish is "very important – it's a part of Jewish culture."

Nesya Goldberg

Goldberg, who took introductory Yiddish last year, has a number of scholastic awards to her credit.

Deitch, a native of Chicago who moved here in 1970, grew up in a Yiddish-speaking home. He took an intermediate Yiddish course in part so he could finally understand the writings of his father, Mattes Deitch, who authored almost a dozen books of Yiddish poetry.

The course was "marvellous, beautiful," said Deitch. "There was literature, stories and singing, but the main thing was the communication of ideas and feelings. We have such a marvellous Yiddish culture."



Daniel Deitch

Deitch, who has also taken Holocaust Studies at U of T, where his daughter is working on a PhD in English Literature, spent his summer reading thousands of pages of Yiddish literature, he said. "Yes it's slow going, but I'm reading good stuff."

He is optimistic about the future of Yiddish. "Hebrew was revived at a time we thought it would never happen," he noted. Although the birth of modern Hebrew was facilitated by having a country – even before the founding of the State of Israel, there were once "10 million people who spoke Yiddish and they didn't have their own country," said Deitch.

This year marks 25 years since Yiddish courses were first offered at U of T. The late Medres Glass, for whom one of the scholarships is named, was the first Yiddish instructor at the university.

Tom Rachman, the third award winner, was not reachable at press time.

Winnipeg community centre opens with much fanfare

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Over the past few years, Sheldon Berney, president of the new Asper Jewish Community Campus, painted many mental pictures of the $28 million facility's grand opening. He was not disappointed.

On a recent Sunday, close to 2,000 members of this city's Jewish community came out for the grand opening in what Laurie Mainster, chair of the planning committee described as "the largest gathering in the history of Winnipeg's Jewish community."

Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon, one of a long list of speakers, said the campus is the "envy of Jewish communities throughout North America," while Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJJC) president Larry Hurtig described it as "the most important" project in the 120-year history of Winnipeg's Jewish community.

The campus is "an investment not only in our Jewish community but also in the larger community of which we are a part," said emcee Harold Buchwald. "It will be an outstanding centre of life and learning. It has rejuvenated our community."

In his remarks, Filmon lauded what he called the Winnipeg Jewish community's international reputation for exuberance — a reputation the campus can only enhance.

He pointed out that it was built and paid for without burdening future generations, and outlined the history of the buildings incorporated in the complex — from their origins in 1906 as an agricultural college to serving as the Manitoba School for the Deaf, a World War I military hospital, military barracks, and provincial government offices — until the Jewish community acquired the complex.

Ron Duhamel, federal Secretary of State for Western Economic Development, described the campus as a valuable resource for the Jewish community and Winnipeg as a whole.

"It is a place where all Manitobans can learn about the Jewish culture," he said. He also noted that the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada and Holocaust Education Centre (to which the federal government contributed $3.65 million) is the first of its kind in the country.

Jehudi Kinar, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, noted the tremendous impact Winnipeg's Jewish community has had on Canadian Jewry.

"Wherever I go across Canada and even in Israel, I find former Winnipeggers among the community leaders," he said. "Rarely do you see a Jewish community of this size with such a well established Jewish school system. (The Gray Academy of Jewish Education on the campus numbers about 840 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 12.) It is the envy of other communities."

Izzy Asper, a major contributor to the campus, expressed his gratitude to Jewish pioneers, including his parents, Leon and Cecilia Asper (after whom the centre is named) and his in-laws, Morris and Sarah Bernstein — who made the "difficult and uncharted journey" to Winnipeg.

WJCC president Hurtig praised his predecessor, Don Aronovitch, and singled out Laurie Mainster and Harold Buchwald for their efforts.

He presented special plaques to Sheldon Berney, Marjorie Blankstein (chair of the capital campaign) and Bob Freedman, executive director of the WJCC.

Marjorie Blankstein chaired the Long Range Planning Committee that recommended the building of the campus.

The Max and Rose Rady Jewish Community Centre is named after her parents.

The dedication program was rounded out by an invocation from Rabbi Peretz Weitzman, rabbi emeritus of the B'nay Abraham Synagogue, and a 35-voice choir under the leadership of Cantor Richard Yaffe.

The ceremony concluded with the unveiling of a commemorative dedication plaque by Sol Kanee and Grade 1 students Skylar Kneller and Jonathon Ripstein.

Cornwall maintains minyan despite dwindling numbers

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

CORNWALL — Though the average age in this dwindling Jewish community is 70, there is still a Shabbat minyan at historic Congregation Beth-El.

At its peak, the community in the eastern Ontario town consisted of 120 families, but now it is down to 30. For the first time, there is not one locally Jewish-owned business in the city.

"I only have 15 people I can call to a minyan and last winter so many were away we had to cancel the Shabbat minyan for the first time," said Marc Goldhammer, 75, the shul's president for the past 15 years. "What the future holds I dare not say." His father-in-law, Julius Miller, was president for 25 years before him.

But the aging community, one of the oldest in Canada with Jewish settlement going back to the 1860s, is proud of the good relations it has had over the years with its English and French-Canadian neighbors.

Eugene Larocque, the Roman Catholic bishop of Cornwall, regularly attends the Kol Nidre service, fasts on Yom Kippur, and breaks the fast with shul members.

Cornwall has a history of producing Jews who made good in politics, Goldhammer said, including Toronto mayor Nathan Phillips, Aaron Horovitz, Cornwall mayor for 16 years and George Simon, mayor of Alexandria. The family of Sam Jacobs, first Jewish member of the House of Commons, came from this area.

"At one time four of our 10 council members were Jewish. During the Jewish holidays, there was little shopping done because so many stores on Pitt street were closed."

Among the well known families were the Vinebergs, Kellerts and Friedmans.

Goldhammer, now retired, was a high school teacher for 25 years, and taught data processing even before the school had a computer.

His late wife, the former Helen Miller, was one of the first Jewish high school teachers in Ontario. Their son, Bram, is a well known Toronto musician, while a daughter, Sharon, is executive secretary of the Atlanta, Ga., Jewish community.

Former residents of Cornwall have raised $30,000 for a reserve fund to help the shul stay open, and the interest on the investment helps defray operating costs.

"It was a phenomenal place to live," said Peter Loebel of Toronto who resided here with his family, 1956-61 . "Everyone gave newcomers a helping hand."

The shul has fraternal associations with Jewish communities in Canton, Messina, Potsdam, Ogdensburg and others in northern New York state and invites their residents to take part in Chanukah celebrations.

When the St. Lawrence seaway was developed in the 1950s, three graves had to be moved from an area of the Jewish cemetery, and a new cemetery was given to the community west of the city.

"The government was wonderful in its dealings with us on the cemetery," said Goldhammer.

If spirit can keep a place alive, then the future of Cornwall's Jewish community is assured. Despite its small population and distance from major Jewish centres, eight families still keep kosher homes.

Silverstone returns to CJC

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jack Silverstone is back at the helm of Canadian Jewish Congress after a one-year sabbatical in Israel, where he gained insight into the country's complexities, improved his Hebrew and had time to reflect on life in general.

"I wouldn't say I've been transformed, but it's almost impossible to be in as intense a society as Israel for a year and not have your perceptions changed," said Silverstone, 46. One thing that struck him was how Israelis regard themselves as "one big family."

"Being there during the [terrorist] bombings and the [army] helicopter crash, you can appreciate how traumatic such events are...the whole country was in mourning," he said.

The CJC national executive director and general counsel has changed perceptively outside as well. His grey hair has been cropped very short, he sports a tiny stud earring and looks fit and relaxed. (He worked out four times a week.)

Silverstone surprised many last year when he took a leave of absence, closed up his Dollard des Ormeaux home and brought his wife Ann, and three children, a daughter, now 15, and sons 12 and 5, to Israel. They lived in the community of Ra'anana, north of Tel Aviv.

"I could see the lights of the West Bank from my balcony. It makes you more painfully aware of the security problems."

Jack and Ann attended ulpan for 4½ months and the children entered regular public school and did well, which gave him a greater appreciation of the quality of Jewish education in Montreal. Silverstone served as a civilian volunteer for a month in the IDF, the fourth time he has taken part in the program. In this instance, he acted as a liaison with the United Nations peacekeepers, from his base at the Allenby Bridge

He did some writing, including a lengthy piece on the Jewish community and the Quebec independence movement for Jerusalem Letter, a publication of the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs, and attended various international Jewish communal functions. He toured the country with his kids.

Silverstone said he suffered no disillusionment because "I went to experience the reality of contemporary Israel, which is a dynamic, modern, forward-looking society, beset with external and internal problems...To cling to a romantic, idealized vision of Israel does no one any good."

He was pleasantly surprised, contrary to popular image, at how efficient the Israeli bureaucracy is. On the other hand, he was sickened by the level of carnage on Israel's highways, a consequence of aggressive driving that he had difficulty getting used to.

One disturbing observation he made is the depth of the "mutual ignorance" between Israel and the Diaspora. "I'm astonished at how many Jews – people I know – who have never been to Israel. Not enough Jews are visiting Israel."

As for Israelis, he finds too many "negate the validity of the Diaspora, with the possible exception of the United States...Israelis must learn that Jewish life is possible outside Israel, that the Diaspora has an important role."

Personally, the hardest adjustment he had to make was living without the structure of daily route. "I've been working since I was 14. There was never a time that I was not employed. It was difficult to adjust to a slower pace."

Living in Israel indefinitely was not his goal, and he says he's come back renewed for his old job. "I feel more serene. I've got a better sense of what's important and what's not."

Silverstone stayed in regular contact with the CJC office and feels he was kept abreast of what was happening.

Back in Montreal, he finds little has changed. The news is still dominated by the same political issues and the community appears to have the same concerns and anxieties.

Unique Parliament to begin

Scene in Ottawa

By STEPHEN BINDMAN

OTTAWA — This town has finally awoken from its post-election slumber.

After Jean Chrétien and the Liberals were returned with their second straight majority government in June, the entire political and bureaucratic machinery in Ottawa seemed to effectively shut down.

It wasn't a short nap, but an intense period of hibernation, as if someone hung a "closed for business" sign on the outskirts of the national capital.

Chrétien was quick to appoint his new cabinet – veteran Jewish minister Herb Gray assumed the lofty but perhaps not onerous mantle of deputy prime minister – but just as quickly the new ministers hustled out of town.

Armed with bulging briefing books prepared by the mandarins, the ministers retired to wherever ministers retire to figure out their new responsibilities. Staffs were shuffled, priorities prioritized.

Chrétien headed for golf links far and near, a few ministers adjourned to la belle province to take French lessons, while Unity Minister Stéphane Dion obviously spent his spare time at his typewriter, engaging in a tit-for-tat letter-writing campaign with his Quebec counterpart.

Imagine a private-sector company that decided to do nothing for four months in the middle of the fiscal year.

But now it has apparently occurred to the Liberals that in fact they were re-elected to govern and so they are scrambling to prepare for the fall session of Parliament.

And so are the various advocacy groups that monitor the goings-on on Parliament Hill and try to twist the arms of politicians of all stripes for their pet causes.

This will be a Parliament like no other – a House of Commons with five recognized political parties representing largely regional blocks. Liberal, Reform, Bloc Québécois, Progressive Conservative and NDP all won enough seats to win "official party status" in the Commons that will allow them to ask questions during the 45-minute daily theatrics of Question Period and to sit on Commons committees.

"There is no question that the results of the election have left a kind of quilt pattern in the House," says Eric Vernon, director of the Ottawa advocacy office for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

"There are going to be four official opposition parties now, all of which will be clamoring for a say, which will make for perhaps an even more interesting and raucous question period.

"In addition, there are certain regional distinctions that have developed as well, particularly given the fact that the Reform party will now be the official Opposition and have not managed to break out of their pattern of being a western party. Their hoped-for breakthrough in Ontario didn't happen and they don't appear to be particularly ready for any kind of advances elsewhere."

Call this Parliament what you want – pizza pie, Balkanized – but it will certainly be different.

That means the Liberals will have to learn to govern differently, especially with a razor-thin majority and a group of a hundred or so increasingly restless Ontario backbenchers who are apparently tiring of acting like trained seals.

And groups like CJC will also have to learn to do their Hill business a little bit differently.

Says Vernon, the affable eyes and ears of Congress in Ottawa: "We do this sort of work as a matter of course, no matter what the Parliament looks like. But this one in particular is going to require of us to do more of it and to approach more people to get our message across.

"Generally speaking, we need to get to more and more MPs of all parties whose voice will have a say.

"I think what we were doing before was speaking to MPs of all parties, but certainly there was more of an emphasis on the larger parties and the parties with official status. When you've got four opposition parties that have official standing, you're going to have MPs who will be more involved in the day-to-day management of legislative affairs. They're going to have more and more impact on shaping legislation.

"So I think the onus will be on us to meet with more and more people and convey our concerns and to articulate the perspectives of the community on major issues."

You're going to see more representation of opposition members on committees than there were before.

The parliamentary action starts Sept. 22. Stay tuned.

4 cousins celebrate joint bat mitzvah

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Cousins Emily Baron Cadloff, Laura Miles, Lee Goldstein and Marti Sarbit recently celebrated what may have been Winnipeg's first quadruple bat mitzvah.

The bat mitzvah, held at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, was a Minchah service in which the first portion of the Torah reading for the following Shabbat is read.

"We wanted the bnot mitzvah to do as much of the service as possible," says Ricky Miles, Laura's mother.

There were four aliyot, one for each family. The girls read equal portions of the Torah reading and similarly divided the Haftorah reading. Their mothers led the Ashrei prayer.

"Rabbi Deborah Schloss [Shaarey Zedek's assistant rabbi] wanted each girl to do something significant on her own as well," Miles says.

"Laura did the prayer when opening the Aron Kodesh, Emily did a dvar Torah, Lee [who is from Israel] read the prayer for the State of Israel and Marti did an introduction to the Haftorah.

"This was a special event which we know the girls will never forget," says Miles. "They developed a special bond and supported each other throughout. Even though they come from different backgrounds, communities and upbringings, a bat mitzvah is something universal that they can all share."

Vancouver CJA campaign begins

By ROBERTA STALEY
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — A professional fundraiser from Israel brought to Vancouver to convince donors to give more to this year's Combined Jewish Appeal Campaign is claiming success.

Itzik Lev, 50, senior member in charge of special projects for the Jerusalem-based United Israel Appeal, said he's received a warm reception so far from the nearly dozen contributors he met in Vancouver during a three-week trip to that city.

"The five or six I've met individually – most of them have increased their contribution. When you have the time to sit down and explain the partnership, the responses are appropriate," he said.

Lev's work lobbying donors will be continued by Zvi Raviv, also from Israel. "Raviv will be here for another couple of weeks doing what I'm doing," Lev said. "He'll be the entrée and I'll be the hors d'oeuvre."

The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's four-month 1997 combined appeal campaign started Sept. 1. It raises money for 23 agencies, including the the Jewish Agency in Israel as well as several national and Lower Mainland agencies.

Lev said more money is needed to help the Jewish Agency, which funds immigration and related programs. Israel takes in between 5,000 and 6,000 new immigrants a year, mostly from the former Soviet Union, he said.

Federation's executive is making a special effort this year to boost its campaign fundraising tally over last year's disappointing $3.79-million total, $309,000 short of the amount raised in 1995. After last year's shortfall, Lower Mainland agencies were forced to swallow an 11 percent cutback in funding at the start of 1997.

To heighten the profile, Federation also organized an official Sept. 11 kickoff event at Beth Israel synagogue that included speeches by Israeli Knesset member Yael Dayan, daughter of the late Israeli defence minister Moshe Dayan.

This year, $1 million, or about 37 per cent of the total amount raised, is earmarked for Israel. About $370,000 is pledged to national programs such as the Canadian Jewish Congress, much of which goes to the Pacific region. The rest of the money helps fund 19 Lower Mainland agencies.

Federation has approved a total of $1,512,650 to the Lower Mainland agencies for the 1997-98 budget, a drop of 13.3 percent from last year's $1,744,954 total.

Calgary students join in ethics conference in Israel

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — One hundred students and teachers from six countries gathered in Jerusalem in July to explore a revolutionary concept: integrating the study of ethics into high school science and humanities curricula.

Among the participants were 20 students and four teachers from two Calgary schools.

The Ethics in Science and Humanities seminar was the culmination of a year-long experimental project, where students at 10 schools in Israel, Jordan, Cyprus, Australia, Canada and the United States explored the theory of philosophy and various ethical issues ranging from the risks of scientific experimentation, to the moral implications of progress, to the effect of art on human welfare.

The project was an offshoot of an Ethics in Science and Humanities curriculum first conceived and developed at Jerusalem's Israel Arts and Science Academy, a three-year high school for gifted students. The Israeli program encourages students to consider ethical values and social implications within their daily academic instruction.

The participation in the July seminar represented a multicultural mosaic of religious and secular Jews, Muslims, Catholics, Protestants and Greek Orthodox. Coming together at the Arts and Science Academy in Jerusalem, the students and teachers attempted to devise an ethics program to reach a wider international audience.

"The initiative is timely as well as important," said Prof. William Damon, director of Brown University's Centre for the Study of Human Development, who was one of the seminar's scholars in residence. "At this moment in human history, it is urgent that we find ways to educate the younger generation toward both intellectual competence and social responsibility. The Academy's program is unique, in that it proposes to accomplish both goals simultaneously. This is an approach that has rarely if ever been tried before."

For the teachers and students from St. Mary's High School and John G. Diefenbaker Senior High School in Calgary, the story began last November, with a visit from Rafi Amram, a teacher at the Israel Arts and Science Academy. Concerned that the lack of ethics instruction in schools is detrimental to overall education, Amram is determined to expand the Israeli concept to schools around the world.

"Rafi is a man with a vision and he doesn't let much stand in his way," said Ian Strachen of the Alberta Science foundation, one of the educators involved in the seminar. Strachan had worked with Amram before on another Israeli initiative, the Discovery Project, which encourages economically disadvantaged students to study science and math.

This past experience, combined with Amram's ties to the Calgary-based Sheldon Chumir and Kahanoff Foundations, both of which funded the project, contributed to Calgary's selection as the only Canadian city to participate in the experimental program.

Both Alex Ulaszonek of St. Mary's and Jack Cohen of Diefenbaker School are enthusiastic supporters of the program and hope to see it grow and evolve.

"So many schools have eliminated any kind of questioning in the classroom regarding moral or ethical issues," Ulaszonek said. "Rafi's goal is to bring moral and ethical education back into the system."

The first week was spent touring the country.

In the second week of the trip, students and teachers participated in three two-hour sessions each day, exploring ethical dilemmas such as "whistle blowing" in the workplace and medical questions such as cloning. A symposium on human cloning was held in conjunction with the seminar.

The participants were divided into small groups with one student from each school, two teachers, and two observers. The groups attacked these basic questions: When is science humanistic? Should science teaching be value-free? Are moral dilemmas real? Pluralism in ethical education — is it possible? Is it desirable?

Despite the intensity of the debate during the workshops, the students found they also had much in common.

"Coming from different countries, religions, and ages, it was very nice that we could all get along so well," said Brad Wile, a student at St. Mary's. "We had huge differences, and argued during the day but in the evening we all laughed and talked together."

The students learned that when it comes to ethics and morality, there are no answers. Discussion only raises more questions, but in the process "you learn more about yourself, your feelings and attitudes," Cohen said.

While both Cohen and Ulaszonek already have ideas on how to incorporate the study of ethics into their schools curricula, the next step is to get more schools and teachers involved.

Cohen said the challenge now is to generate concrete materials for teachers, to find ways to make this kind of study work in regular-sized classrooms and to motivate teachers.

BATTLE FOR THE JEWISH SOUL

THE MISSIONARY THREAT TO JEWS

The recent opening of "City of David," a new "Hebrew Christian" church at Steeles and Bathurst, has infuriated Toronto's Jewish community. This church targets Jews for conversion and deceptively calls itself a "Synagogue."

Leaders meet in Ottawa with Axworthy

[Cont'd from page 1]

Other areas discussed were ongoing bilateral consultations between Canada and Israel, the Liberals' imminent introduction of anti-terrorism legislation and the role Canada can play in upgrading Israel's stature at the UN.

As well, Axworthy proposed a joint project to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary.

A letter sent to Axworthy following the meeting, from the CIC's retiring chair, Stephen Victor, praised the minister as "a true friend of the Jewish community and the State of Israel."

Victor said he feels Axworthy shares the community "collective anxiety" over security in Israel.

The meeting was "friendly but frank," said participant Jack Silverstone, national executive director of CJC.

The meeting sought "a higher level of cooperation" between Canada and Israel, and an appreciation from Axworthy of what Israelis are going through, Silverstone said.

The delegation said the Jewish community is "upset and angry" over expectations that Israel should return to the bargaining table after every terror attack.

Silverstone said the minister indicated that Canada and Israel will soon upgrade their bilateral consultations on security and terrorism. Just last month, Axworthy sent a letter to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat urging him to combat terror more forcefully.

Silverstone said Canada's voting pattern at the UN was raised, and that Axworthy indicated Canada often looks toward other blocs at the UN with whom it shares attitudes.

According to the CIC, Axworthy has started a review of Canada's voting record at the UN.

The Jewish leaders said they were pleased with Axworthy's willingness to help change Israel's status at the UN.

The UN is divided into large geographic blocs, and Israel is the only country to be shunned from all of them, including the Mideast bloc. Only countries that belong to a bloc can be members of UN committees.

According to the delegation, Axworthy said he would try to facilitate Israel's membership in the Western Europe and Others Group.

The minister, said Silverstone, indicated he wants to visit Israel.

Apart from Ritter, Silverstone and Victor, the delegation included CJC president Goldie Hershon; incoming CIC chair Brian Morris; CZF national president Kurt Rothschild; B'nai Brith president Lyle Smordin; and BBC executive vice-president Frank Dimant.

Simcha Jacobovici wins second Emmy Award

He first pitched the idea six years ago and kept at it year after year until it was finally accepted by CBC and HBO. Although he wanted to direct the film, he had other commitments when the funding came through and he asked Bill Cobban, a former senior producer at CBC, to take on the project, he said.

According to Jacobovici, "the film has had its share of mitzvahs." Its completion coincided with the first international conference on the sexual exploitation of children held in Stockholm last spring, and that conference became the venue for the film's world premier, he said.

"Because of that conference suddenly something obscure became front page news in the main media."

He said that as a consequence of the film, a safe-house for sexually exploited girls in Nepal slated to lose its funding from UNICEF, got its funding reinstated, and a young girl featured in the film – a hidden camera captured her father selling her to a brothel – was rescued "from the ugly road to hell" by Cobban. "If that happens to one more kid because of the Emmy, that's great."

He attributed his interest in making films about social issues to being a child of Holocaust survivors.

A former student activist, Jacobovici went into filmmaking to publicize the plight of the Falasha Jews in Ethiopia. In 1983, he directed and produced Falasha: Exile of the Black Jews, for which he won two international awards. Three years later, he teamed up with Elliott Halpern to establish Associated Producers.

The company has won dozens of awards for such films as Ebola: Inside an Outbreak, about the 1995 outbreak of the ebola virus in Zaire; Jews in Russia: An American Unholy War, which dealt with American evangelists working with the Jews of the former Soviet Union; and Deadly Currents, an examination of the Arab Israeli conflict.

Jacobovici said that while he directs many films with Jewish themes, his company and the networks do not make a distinction between Jewish and secular projects. He stressed that broadcasters will air shows about Jews or any ethnic group as long as the film is high quality and the story "speaks to a general audience."

Associated Producers is poised to launch Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies and the American Dream, based on Neal Gabler's book, An Empire of Their Own. The film about the Jews who created Hollywood will premier at a gala fundraiser for the Bloor and Riverdale Jewish community centres the second week of November.

A film about the quest for lost Jewish tribes scattered across Asia will air on CBC next year.

Jacobovici shared credit for the Emmy with his three co-winners: Halpern, co-producer; Cobban, director/producer; and Ruchira Grupta, field producer in India. He also praised the work of production and location manager Felix Golubev, who skillfully handled logistic problems like setting up a hidden camera in an Indian brothel.

Israel, U.S. hail new anti-terror apparatus

By JAY BUSHINSKY, STEVE RODAN and MOHAMMED NAJIB
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli and American officials described U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's talks as a qualified success, contending that she convinced the Palestinian Authority (PA) that it must wage an all-out war against terrorism.

"She drove home the gravity with which the Clinton administration views this issue," an Israeli source said.

In an early signal of the government's satisfaction with the measures ordered by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat — at Albright's behest — to crush terrorism, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu authorized the immediate transfer of 25 million shekels to the PA.

This sum constitutes half of the funds paid by Palestinians in customs fees, VAT, and other taxes, that were withheld by Israel because of terrorist attacks.

"The prime minister decided on this as a gesture of goodwill, in view of the initial steps taken by the PA in the anti-terror war," an official announcement said.

Evaluating Albright's accomplishments in even more enthusiastic terms, a senior American official said: "There now is a crystallized Palestinian mechanism that will control the issues raised with Arafat."

However, Channel 2 raised a discordant diplomatic note, when it cited influential security sources as saying the Americans have acquired the pivotal position of umpires in the anti-terror effort, empowered to judge the accuracy or relevance of the two sides' claims to success or charges of failure.

Israel also lifted the internal closure of Palestinian-ruled towns and cities in the West Bank imposed after the last suicide attack in Jerusalem.

"The defence minister and chief of general staff over the weekend approved the lifting of the internal closure," the IDF Spokesperson said.

The closure was lifted at 5 a.m. Monday. A general closure barring Palestinians from entering Israel will remain in force.

Albright herself made no claims of a breakthrough, during a press conference with King Hussein in Amman. But she has set up some preliminary talks in Washington and New York this month that could eventually pay off. One set of talks will involve Israeli and Palestinian diplomats; the other, Israeli and Syrian.

Meanwhile, Palestinian Preventive Security chief Jibril Rajoub warned Israel against operating in PA-controlled areas.

"We will not allow the General Security Service to conduct any activities inside the autonomous areas," Rajoub said. "Our reply will be much stronger than what they are expecting and if they succeed once, we will not allow them to succeed again."

Rajoub denied reports that Israeli and Palestinian security officials met over the weekend to discuss cooperation. The last meeting between Israeli and Palestinian security officials was on Sept. 4, he said.

Since then, he said, the PA has insisted that a CIA representative attend such meetings.

David Bar-Illan, Netanyahu's director of communications and policy planning, confirmed that there was no meeting between Israeli and Palestinian security officials over the weekend. He said, however, that there were "encouraging signs" of security cooperation between the two sides.

Dispute over identity of suicide bombers continues

Israeli and PA officials also continue to dispute the identities of the suicide bombers in Machane Yehuda and Rehov Ben-Yehuda attacks. PA secretary-general Tayib Abdul Rahim said that Iran is responsible for both, as well as a previous foiled bombing attempt on a Tel Aviv beach.

Abdul Rahim said the suicide bombers flew in to Israel and although Israel tried to conceal this information by clamping a ban on publishing details of the investigation, the circumstances were relayed to Albright.

The bombs used in all three incidents were of the same type, Abdul Rahim said. He said Israeli police have discovered that one of the bombers was a light-skinned, blond man who entered on a forged passport and checked into Tel Aviv's Ambassador Hotel.

Abdul Rahim said Israeli police discovered traces of the bomb in the hotel room and they matched the explosives used in Machane Yehuda and Rehov Ben-Yehuda.

Israeli officials, including Netanyahu, have said the bombers were Hamas agents from the territories. They dismiss the PA claims that the bombers were foreigners as disinformation aimed at absolving the PA of responsibility for the attacks.

Speaking at the weekly cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said Albright's visit "focused on the question of the fight against Palestinian terrorism."

He said that as a result, an agreement was reached between the U.S. and the Palestinians regarding a plan to fight the terrorist infrastructure and prevent the release of terrorists under the "revolving door" method, that is, arresting suspects after an incident, then releasing them several days later.

Netanyahu reported to the cabinet on Albright's invitation to Israeli and Palestinian officials to confer separately with American counterparts at the State Department, and to Foreign Minister David Levy and PA Deputy Chair Mahmoud Abbas to meet her at the UN General Assembly session in New York.

Levy was particularly upbeat about Albright's mission. He dismissed the various media reports that she failed to foster conditions for the renewal of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations as "baseless," and contended that "there is no break in contact and no vacuum" between Israel and the PA.

He cited three accomplishments: creation of an efficient apparatus to evaluate the PA's actions against terrorism and the terrorist infrastructure; definition of the subjects to be clarified by the two sides; and convening supportive talks in Washington and New York.

"Israel has not quit the peace process," he said. "It insists on the fulfilment of commitments, especially in the security sphere, and the United States also demands that the PA uphold these commitments."

Lashing out at critics who described the Albright mission as a "failure," Levy said that "despite the tension of recent days, the assertion that an unavoidable explosion is imminent cannot be accepted."

Egypt sees hope for the peace process

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak called Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's recent visit "encouraging" and said there are signs the Middle East peace process could move forward.

Albright held about 2½ hours of talks with Mubarak and Foreign Minister Amr Moussa in the seaside Ras el-Teen palace in Alexandria.

"We are going to continue discussions and cooperation," he said.

Later in the day, Albright met with Saudi Arabia's King Fahd in the Red Sea port city of Jeddah, the Saudi Press Agency (SPA) said.

SPA said Crown Prince Abdullah attended the meeting between the monarch and Albright in King Fahd's office at al-Salam Palace. It gave no other details.

Albright, who flew to Jeddah from Alexandria, earlier met Saudi Minister of Foreign Affairs Prince Saud al-Faisal and "discussed current conditions in the Middle East and ways to support the peace process," SPA said.

She met the foreign ministers of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) states — Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Bahrain, Qatar and Oman on Sunday.

In Damascus, President Hafez al-Assad told Albright that Syria is still committed to making peace with Israel, but reiterated the conditions for resuming the negotiations broken off over a year ago.

Hosni Mubarak

"Talks [with Israel] should resume from the point where they left off," Assad's spokesperson, Joubran Kourieh, quoted the president as telling Albright during a four-hour meeting.

"President Assad reiterated Syria's commitment to achieve a just and comprehensive peace on the basis of the Madrid conference, Security Council resolutions, and the land-for-peace principle," Kourieh said.

Albright discussed with Assad how to revive the stalled Syrian-Israeli negotiations, he said.

"Both reviewed efforts being exerted to revive the peace process on all tracks and the position of each of the parties concerned," Kourieh said.

U.S. officials said Albright's talks with Assad were "exploratory." No further U.S. comment was immediately available.

Foreign Minister Farouk Shara and Syrian Ambassador to Washington Walid Mualem attended the Assad-Albright meeting at the presidential place, Kourieh said. Also present was U.S special Middle East peace envoy Dennis Ross.

Immediately before the secretary of state left for Damascus, a senior administration official said "senior representatives" of Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) have been invited to Washington for separate bilateral talks.

These sessions will be a prelude to a trilateral American-Israeli-Palestinian session at UN headquarters in New York to be attended by Albright, Foreign Minister David Levy, and the PA's second-in-command, Mahmoud Abbas.

The official quoted Albright as having informed her Israeli and Palestinian hosts that she does not intend to return to the Middle East "until tough decisions are taken by the [Israeli and Palestinian] leaders." He said Albright "will not come back to tread water."

Albright's conclusion that "a crisis of confidence" exists between Israel and the PA was cited by the official as one of the reasons for her having proposed a "time out" in preparation for the onset of final-status talks between the parties.

During this period, she hopes that Israel would avoid steps that might create problems for the other side, and that the PA would make sure there is no halt in the fight against terrorism and a concurrent halt in its war of words against Israel.

"The U.S. view is that the PA is doing something [about terrorism], but not enough," he went on. "Some arrests have been made of people we knew that should have been arrested. But it is not enough to fight terrorism when it is convenient."

To succeed, the final-status talks must be conducted in an environment that reflects mutual trust, the official went on. But he asked rhetorically: "How do you break out of the current atmosphere of distrust?"

One of Albright's accomplishments during her three-day stay here was to secure Palestinian as well as Israeli consent to advance to final-status talks, rather than go on seeking interim agreements.

"Both sides are prepared to accept this sequence," the official said.

"There must be greater confidence about where the two sides are headed," he added, explaining that this is the reason for the preliminary sessions with the respective parties before proceeding to the trilateral talks in New York.

"The secretary decided this is a small step," he said, adding that it is a basis for the U.S. to be involved. "We won't walk away."

Asked at a news briefing about the secretary's call for a halt to settlement expansion, the official said her remarks were "about Palestinian perceptions," implying that this may not necessarily be her personal assessment.

"We believe that it is very important that terror not dominate the scene in Israel," Albright said in Egypt. "It is very hard for the people of Israel to negotiate in the presence of bombers.

"And we do believe it is very important for Chairman Arafat to do everything that he can... in order to dismantle the Hamas infrastructure and to work to the best of his efforts to control the terrorist activities. We hope very much that there will not be unilateral acts by either side which preempt final-status issues."

She said the environment for peace "is based on fulfilling mutual obligations and responsibilities."

Two soldiers killed in Lebanon

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Two Golani Brigade soldiers – Staff Sgt. Roslan Yosipov, 21, of Nesher, and Staff Sgt. Ophir Basol, 21, of Kfar Sava – were killed by a roadside bomb in south Lebanon on Saturday night.

The Golani unit was on patrol in the western sector of the security zone close to midnight, when the bomb hidden at the side of the road exploded as they passed. Yosipov was killed instantly and Basol later died on the operating table. A third soldier, Assaf Saydah, was lightly wounded in the hand by shrapnel.

Hezbollah claimed responsibility for the attack, declaring that it had been an act of revenge for the death of Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah's son, Hadi, who was killed by IDF troops on Friday.

Maj.-Gen. Amiram Levine appointed a committee to enquire into the incident.

The Golani unit was on its way to set up an ambush near the village of Talousa, not far from Wadi Saluki, when Basol, the point man, apparently triggered the device. The unit's medic treated Basol and Saydeh, as an air force rescue squad was summoned.

Levine said the rescue took some time, as the troops came under fire and the evacuation took place on difficult terrain.

Yosipov was buried in the military section of the Hof Hacarmel cemetery in Haifa. The oldest of three, he had been working to assist his widowed mother in supporting the family. Relatives said he had constantly badgered his mother until she gave permission for him to serve in the Golani Brigade. He is also survived by a brother and sister.

Basol was buried in the military section of the Kfar Sava Cemetery.

At his wounded son's bedside, Haim Saydah, who was blinded in both eyes by a grenade explosion during military service in Lebanon in 1975, said, "When your child serves in Lebanon, neither the mothers nor fathers nor sisters nor brothers can go about their daily lives in a normal manner. You constantly listen to the news."

Group calls for unilateral withdrawal

The casualties raised further public outcry for a unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon.

"We go from shivah to shivah," Ronit Nahmias, head of the Committee of Four Mothers, told Israel Radio. "Claims that IDF troops must remain in Lebanon to safeguard the north do not satisfy us any longer."

She said that where once her group was considered outcasts, today thousands identify with the cause.

"Our sons serve in Lebanon. It is inconceivable that the situation that has gone on for 15 years could go on for another 15," she said.

Meanwhile, Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak charged that there are definite signs of fatigue in the country.

Talking about the public outcry on Lebanon, Shahak said, "There are those who want a quick and clear-cut solution. I don't believe we have an answer that can be implemented quickly without taking risks."

Yesterday's deaths brought to 33 the number of IDF fatalities in Lebanon since the beginning of the year, said an IDF spokesperson. He added that this does not include soldiers killed in accidents. During the same period last year, 20 soldiers were killed in Lebanon.

Lebanon has rejected an Israeli proposal to negotiate a security agreement in south Lebanon, the Defence Ministry said.

Through a third party, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai approached "a high-ranking commander of the Lebanese army to work out a security agreement that would limit the number of deaths on both sides," said ministry spokesperson Avi Benayahu. "Lebanon rejected the proposal."

Negotiating impasse yet to be broken

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

As expected, Madeleine Albright failed to revive the moribund Oslo peace process. It still dangles by a thread in the wake of three Hamas suicide bombings which have claimed the lives of 23 Israelis since March.

On the eve of her departure from Israel and the Palestinian autonomous areas last week, the U.S. secretary of state acknowledged she had "a long way to go" in reconciling Israel's basic position with that of the Palestine Authority (PA).

In her first trip to the Mideast since taking office eight months ago, Albright had hoped to whittle down the daunting differences between Israel and the PA. But after talks with Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat, she discovered that the two sides are still greatly at odds over fundamental issues.

Two weeks after Israel announced it is no longer bound by the Oslo accords and will not fulfil its pledge to carry out troop withdrawals from the West Bank until the PA deals with terrorism on a sustained basis, the gap remains discouragingly enormous.

Israel is demanding a wholesale crackdown on the terrorist infrastructure in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip before it ends the closure and the economic sanctions it imposed on the Palestinians after the July 30 blast in Jerusalem. Only then, Netanyahu says, will it be possible to address the array of political questions at the heart of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. In this respect, the Sept. 4 bombing in Jerusalem only hardened Israel's view.

By contrast, the Palestinians are loath to seriously confront Hamas and Islamic Jihad until Israel stops construction of the Har Choma housing project in eastern Jerusalem, desists from expanding existing settlements in the territories, terminates the blockade and ceases withholding taxes and customs duties.

Faced by these conflicting claims, Albright arrived in Israel with her own agenda, trying to strike a balance between Israel's need for security with the Palestinians' demand for an easing of restrictions and further Israeli withdrawals.

Drawing on concepts from a major speech she delivered in Washington in August, Albright spoke of restoring trust and confidence between Israel and the PA.

Once in the region, in talks with the leaders and in speeches to students, she elaborated on this theme by stressing the importance of rebuilding "mutual responsibility" and of re-establishing "basic principles" (land for peace) in the search for a just and lasting peace.

Repeatedly, she called on the PA to cooperate with Israel in the struggle to eradicate terrorism once and for all, and warned Arafat that terror not only threatens peace, but the PA and the Palestinians. Much to the Palestinians' annoyance, she made this message the centrepiece of her mission.

Yet, judging by a newspaper photograph showing a beaming Arafat shaking hands with Albright, Israel got an earful, too. Hewing to her belief that Israel must also be faithful to "the spirit" of Oslo, Albright asked Israel to avoid "unilateral actions" which pre-empt and prejudge negotiations. Albright therefore, pressed Israel to suspend the expansion of settlements, to stop seizing Palestinian land and to resume the flow of taxes to the PA. She also called on Netanyahu to abide by Israel's promise to make three redeployments from the West Bank by the autumn of 1998.

By her own admission, Albright achieved remarkably little. She extracted a pledge from Arafat to confront terrorism and to resume security cooperation with Israel, but only time will tell whether he will follow through. Prior to her visit, Arafat had arrested scores of Islamic militants and shut down a newspaper and a youth group affiliated with Hamas.

Fairly satisfied with these preliminary steps, Israel decided to return a further portion of the tax revenues it owes the PA. But Israel said it had no intention of halting settlement expansion, the chief Palestinian grievance.

As a result, the dangerous impasse has yet to be broken.

In the spring of 1998, thousands of Jewish youth from all corners of the world will gather together in Poland and Israel for an experience that will last a lifetime.

Canadian teens on 'front line' during stay in hockey camp

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

METULLA — Fourteen young Canadians had firsthand experience of what it is like to be in Israel's northern settlements when terrorist Katyusha rocket salvos rain down on the upper Galilee.

The group of 14- to 18-year-olds, together with a contingent of 18 Israeli youngsters, were in Metulla to take part in the first hockey camp in Israel held under the guidance of associate St. Louis Blues NHL coach, Roger Neilson. Neilson has been holding hockey camps in Canada for more than 20 years.

"At first we thought our madrichim (youth leaders) were playing a game with us when they told us at about seven in the morning to go down to the bomb shelters," said David Abramovic from Toronto, who was in Israel for the first time. "We stayed in the shelters for about an hour and then we went back home to be told that 50 Katyushas had fallen in different parts of the north and our practice session for the day had been cancelled.

"We were pretty scared and the next night we wanted to sleep in the bomb shelters again, but it wasn't necessary. You see these things in a different light when you are in Canada. Now we understand how life gets back to normal so quickly. These things are soon forgotten. It wouldn't stop me coming back to Israel."

When asked what he thought about the Katyushas, David Charezenko of Toronto said, "Look, you have just got to put this at the back of your mind. This is my first trip to Israel and I have been here for three months as a volunteer. You can't really worry about this — of course it's in your thoughts, but life has to go on."

"In the shelters we heard five separate explosions," said Howard Fremeth of Ottawa. "When you are in Israel, especially in Metulla, and experience these things, you get scared and realize that people in the north of Israel live under this potential threat every single day."

Even with this unwelcome interruption, the camp continued exactly as planned. The idea for the camp was that of Canadian Jeff Budd, competition director of Metulla's Canada Centre. Budd asked goaltending coach Marshall Starkman, who was visiting Israel last year, if he would approach Neilson and ask if he would be interested in holding a hockey camp in Israel for both Canadian and Israeli participants.

Neilson, who had been in Israel before, jumped at the idea and agreed to bring some of his training team with him, including top European coach Alex Andjelic and Florida Panthers' player Bill Lindsay. Neilson and his team donated their time, leaving the Canada Israel Experience Centre and the United Israel Appeal of Canada, who sponsored the two-week camp, to cover only the travel and accommodation expenses of Neilsen and his team.

"I think Israel is great," said David Pivnick of Ottawa. Pivnick, 14, and also on his first visit to Israel, is the youngest of the group. "We've toured northern Israel and have been playing hockey with the Israelis. I'm surprised just how good they are as they haven't been playing very long and don't have the opportunities to learn the game as we do at home."

Rachel Lasry, the only girl in the group, works for the Israel Experience office in Toronto. She helped coordinate the Canadian side of things and was asked to see the job through in Israel. Said Lasry, "I think that the Israelis and Canadians are getting a wonderful experience, and just bringing them together makes it all worth while."

Ryan Clements of Toronto added that the enthusiasm of the Israelis and their team spirit was an ideal for future hockey players.

Most of the Canadian participants heard about the camp from an ad that appeared in The CJN. They made an application, which included information about their hockey experience, and from that data the group was selected.

"This is my first time in Israel and it's the greatest experience in my life," said Joel Ross, also from Toronto. "It's not just the hockey that has brought everybody together, but also the touring."

"I think the camp has been very successful," said Neilson. "The Israeli kids are very eager to get on the ice — they really seem to love the game. What is needed is a couple more ice surfaces down there in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, where all the population is. Hockey could be pretty big here, I think. Israeli kids are very determined and perfect for a team sport like hockey; they have the attributes that lead to success in hockey."

The camp, notwithstanding the temporary intrusion of the Katyusha, was so successful in the view of the organizers, coaches and participants that it is hoped that it will become an annual event and become a catalyst to encourage the development of the sport in Israel.

Israeli ambassador angers Lithuanians

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — A speech by Israel's ambassador to Lithuania has that country's politicians up in arms.

Within days after the speech by Oded Ben Hur, Lithuania's parliament delayed action on amendments to the country's criminal code that would facilitate the investigation of alleged World War II criminals.

During a discussion of the amendments, parliamentarian Rimantas Smetona urged his colleagues not to cave into the pressure of international Jewish organizations.

Smetona, a candidate in Lithuania's December presidential elections, had especially harsh words for Ben Hur, who told the parliament's opening session last week that Lithuania had failed to prosecute alleged war criminals.

Parliament was expected to take the amendments up again next week.

Lithuanian President Algirdas Brazauskas and Prime Minister Gediminas Vagnorius were among those attending the parliamentary session, which was devoted to speeches praising the legacy of the Vilna Gaon, the renowned commentator on the Talmud and Torah whose 200th yahrzeit is being commemorated in Lithuania.

Some Jewish groups, including the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and the Israel-based Association of Lithuanian Jews, boycotted the commemoration, saying that participation would be seen as support for a government that has not yet atoned for the destruction of Lithuanian Jewry.

Nearly 94 percent of the country's prewar Jewish community perished in the Holocaust, a tragedy that local Jews say is not widely known in Lithuania.

Other parliamentarians besides Smetona took issue with Ben Hur's comments, which one legislator said displayed "impudence and tactlessness."

Another legislator, Kazys Bobelis, said that Ben Hur had "insulted the Lithuanian nation."

Bobelis added that parliament had wanted to express its sincere respect for the Vilna Gaon, but that Ben Hur's speech was "absolutely improper and spoiled the festive tranquillity of the event."

Ben Hur made the "rift between the Lithuanian and Jewish nations even wider," he added.

Lithuania's Ministry of Foreign Affairs described Ben Hur's speech as "regrettable."

Ben Hur remained unapologetic, but said he hoped that his comments would not arouse a wave of anti-Semitism in Lithuania.

Doctor provides new hope for Alzheimer's patients

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People suspected of having Alzheimer disease should not be treated as "hopeless," a psychiatrist told a recent meeting on senior care at Beth Tzedec.

In fact, physicians and relatives should exercise extreme caution in using the term, said Dr. Ivan Silver of Sunnybrook Health Science Centre and Dr. Leslie Goldenberg, chief of geriatrics, Scarborough Grace Hospital.

Speaking of the disease itself, Silver was optimistic that new drugs are on the horizon, "which may slow it up [and] offer hope where there was no hope before. In the next 10 years, there is the possibility of treatment. This is just the beginning."

He spoke of a new drug, Arecept, which, he said, shows promise.

Presenting a case history for audience input, Silver and Goldenberg described a 77-year-old woman with the nom-de-plume of "Mrs. Kafka." She was referred by a daughter who asked that her mother not be told if she had dementia or Alzheimer disease.

"She will kill herself if you tell her that," the daughter said. One other child, a son, lived in California.

Drug shows promise

In the case history, the daughter reported that Mrs. Kafka said the superintendent or others in her building were stealing from her, that she was not eating well and that her apartment was filthy.

She had lost her husband four years earlier, had lost a daughter to leukemia and had run her late husband's business for a time. She stopped attending synagogue and volunteering.

"She was a doer and a go-getter. Now she can't do and she can't get," Goldenberg commented.

A small majority of the audience, when queried, voted that the mother should be told of her condition, but Goldenberg disagreed. He said he would tell the daughter that her mother had "Mrs. Kafka's syndrome," pending further assessment.

Doctors face an ethical dilemma over what to tell relatives, Silver said. "It eats us inside and out," he said, revealing that 10 percent of the cases he sees pose this dilemma.

"Mrs. Kafka" was scheduled to drive to Florida soon, as she always did, but Silver said he would have great concern about her driving.

"I would say 'yes' to her going to Florida, with the reservation that some family member visit her in two-week periods."

Goldenberg said it is mostly daughters-in-law, not sons, who care for an aged parent.

In the case of Mrs. Kafka, Silver said, he would ask for an assessment of her in her home setting before making a decision.

Grandchildren should be encouraged to visit their grandparents in nursing homes and told that they are loved by the grandparents, even if there is no recognition.

The two doctors also made these points:

• Most people in their 70s and 80s experience a shrinking of their brain.

• Deterioration of a bridge player's skill, or the complaint of elderly people that they are victims of stealing, may be a clue to memory impairment.

• A crisis in the family is not the best time for an assessment of an aging parent.

• Loss of a spouse often unmasks other problems.

• Doctors are caught in the middle over whether aging people should drive, being pressured by children. The doctor often asks the Motor Licence Bureau to retest the drivers.

• A parent should grant power of attorney while still active and able to understand the situation.

• The inability to remember names and numbers is a normal process of aging.

The three-week series on the Sandwich Generation is sponsored by Beth Tzedec's adult education committee.

Henry Korenblum Family Health Clinic reborn as Centre for Health and Sports Medicine

Genuinely passionate about health promotion, Dr. Howard Winston exudes enthusiasm about his spanking new Centre for Health and Sports Medicine ("CHSM") at Bathurst and Glencairn.

And well he might. This state-of-the-art facility — a reincarnation of the Henry Korenblum Family Health and Sports Medicine Clinic, formerly located at the north "Y" — is well-equipped to handle the training and rehabilitation requirements of almost any patient, from the injured employee seeking to rejoin the work force to the olympic athlete trying to upgrade performance. This multidisciplinary health care centre offers medical assessments by certified sports medicine physicians, injury rehabilitation by registered physiotherapists and certified athletic therapists, massage therapy by registered massage therapists, the designing of exercise programs by a certified personal trainer, nutritional counselling by a registered dietician, and both off-the-shelf and customized brace fitting/orthotics by qualified orthotists.

New facility stresses education in training, rehabilitation

Dr. Winston, like his associate Dr. John Goldsand, believes quite strongly in the educational component of every health care service. "The commitment to educate and teach our patients is a consistent theme in our facility. Just as we have many medical and therapy students pass through our facility, our responsibility for teaching extends to our patients as well." Typically, he continues, patients will have many questions about their condition or ailment, and may be shy about asking them. "Not only do we encourage them to ask these questions," he underlines, "we make it our duty to answer each and every one of them in a scientific and empathetic manner."

Buoyed by the early positive response to the Centre, Dr. Winston and his colleagues "look forward with great enthusiasm to contributing to the health care needs of the local community. Our motto is to improve the patient's state of health and quality of life."

Cardiac patients and those suffering from other serious ailments will enjoy the kind of expert risk assessment needed to design and administer an appropriate program of rehabilitation. Above all, says Dr. Winston, no patient at this facility is ever likely to feel they're in a "factory". "We're not satisfied to have our patients feel their visit is simply an antidote to something bad. We want them to enjoy the experience, learn from it, and turn it into a positive situation. We direct all our energies towards that goal."

Assessment of risk factors critical for cardiac patients

The Centre is located at 2790 Bathurst St. (northwest corner of Bathurst & Glencairn), and is open from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m., Monday to Friday. Free parking is provided at the rear of the building (entrance on Glencairn). The Bathurst bus stops at the door.

Patients may access the Centre by referral from their family doctor or by calling (416) 789-2476 directly.

Play satirizes dating scene

By ADAM BELLO
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — What is it like to be a Jewish single living in Toronto?

That is the question asked in This Could Be The One, a play satirizing the tips, tricks and traps of the local Jewish dating scene. It looks at 1990s dating through the eyes of Jewish adults in their 20s to 40s, spoofing blind dates, telepersonals, singles dances, divorce and family relations, all in the context of Jewish life and culture.

Previously showcased at Leah Posluns as a play-in-progress in March, the initial play was favorably received, drawing over 500 people in two performances, including a Saturday night sell-out.

The current play, performed by the Jewish Theatre Projects (JTP), will run at the Leah Posluns Theatre Sept. 25 at 8 p.m., Sept. 27 at 9:15 p.m., with a matinee performance Sept. 28 at 2 p.m.).

The in-progress version gave JTP an opportunity to gather audience feedback, which was used in the rewrite.

"A lot of young Jewish people go through the frustration of the singles scene and the pressure to live in a couples' world, and this play lets them know they are not alone," says Jodi Miller, writer/director of This Could Be The One.

"We are trying to draw attention to singles issues that should not be ignored in the framework of the Jewish Community. I had people come up to me after the first play and say, 'You spoke to me with that scene,' and that really meant a lot."

Miller, 28, says ones of the purposes of the play is to stimulate discussion among singles and young adults, and encourage them to create alternatives to existing activities in the community. She says she founded Jewish Theatre Projects because she found no artistic outlets of its nature in Toronto.

"When I moved here last year; I thought there would be groups or programs in the Jewish Community for popular theatre and to collaborate with other young people," Miller says. "In the end, there was nothing that existed which explored these areas or emphasized youth."

Determined to bring theatre with a focus on young Jewish adults to Toronto, the Hamilton raised, dramatic arts graduate of University of Windsor initiated the independent troupe. After its first casting call in the fall of 1996, Miller was overwhelmed by the response, as 60 people came to audition.

Initially encountering problems in accessing community resources and having had two false starts in attempts to perform, JTP succeeded in making an arrangement with Leah Posluns Theatre and the BJC to hold the play there in 1997.

"Leah Posluns has been very supportive of us; they are the first ones to help us help ourselves, and that is what the community should be about," Miller says.

The troupe recently signed with Toronto Dominion Bank as a sponsor for This Could Be the One. Miller says its sponsorship has made the play's return possible.

William D. Rubinstein: The Myth of Rescue

Why Allies couldn't save the Jews

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Historians and academics in the past two decades have criticized the democracies for not doing enough to save the plight of European Jews prior to and during World War II.

Now, in The Myth of Rescue, William D. Rubinstein, a professor of history in Australia, debunks the theories and argues, in fact, that the democracies could not have saved more Jews from the Nazis.

In his well-researched and bound-to-be-controversial book, Rubinstein questions several prevailing concepts: that closed-door immigration prevented more Jews from escaping Europe; that there were realistic plans for rescue; that plans to bomb Auschwitz existed; and other "myths of resuce."

The 260-page book is filled with arguments and documentation that Rubinstein uses to make his points.

Rubinstein begins by asserting that the "closed-door" policy of the West has been overstated and all the Jews who wanted to leave Europe prior to the war could have done so. Fully 72 percent of German Jews escaped from Nazi Germany before the start of World War II, including 83 percent of children and youth.

"Given the general restrictions on all refugee migration (Jewish and non-Jewish) which prevailed during the inter-war period throughout the world, the emigration of most German Jews did not represent failure on the part of the democracies but constituted one of the most successful and far-reaching programs of rescue of a beleaguered and persecuted people ever seen up to that time," he writes.

In 1938-40, Rubinstein says, Jews comprised more than half of all immigrants to the United States.

An important point Rubinstein makes is that the Jews of the Nazi Reich must be distinguished from the 7.5 million Jews of continental Europe who came under Nazi rule after September 1939.

Prior to this time, he argues, most European Jews had no reason to believe they were in any danger.

Dutch Jews, for example, could have fled to Surinam, a Dutch colony in South America which had a long-established Jewish community.

"However there was no noteworthy Dutch Jewish migration to Surinam. Plainly no Dutch Jew could foresee the forthcoming genocide." Following the occupation, it was too late for them to leave, because Hitler expressly forbade Jewish migration.

Rubinstein also debunks the idea that plans for rescue were ignored by the Allied High Command; he states categorically that most plans and ideas were presented with hindsight, long after the war was over.

> No rescue scheme was ever proposed

"No scheme which could possibly or realistically have rescued any of the Jews of Nazi-occupied Europe was actually proposed by anyone or by any group in the democracies during the war."

Again he stresses that most of the Jews killed in the Holocaust lived outside Germany before the war. Up to then, they never fully appreciated the danger they were in. After the war began, they could not be classified as refugees but became prisoners of war.

"The Jews could not flee from German-occupied or controlled Europe even if they wished to do so...the barriers to Jewish emigration were deliberately erected by the Nazis."

Rubinstein argues this by pointing out a November 1940 regulation in Poland which banned Jewish emigration because "emigration of Jews of Poland was linked [according to an SS edict] to the 'continued spiritual regeneration of Jews.'"

He writes that most of the plans for rescue merely called for trying to put pressure on neutral nations to accept Jewish refugees, which as we have seen was impossible.

It's also important to note that Hitler became obsessed with eradicating Jews from the face of the earth. "This simple fact is highly relevant, especially to the possibility of reaching deals with the Nazis for the rescue or 'sale' of Jews during the war."

One frequent argument given by modern historians is that the Allies could have and should have bombed Auschwitz.

Rubinstein argues that there is one basic reason why the question of bombing Auschwitz can be dismissed with some brevity: "Virtually no one in the United States proposed bombing it, or any other extermination camp, while significant numbers of Jews were imprisoned there. In particular, the War Refugee Board failed to suggest it."

Recommendations were made, he notes, to bomb the rail lines, in particular the line from Kosice to Prescov to stop or at least slow down the deportation process, particularly of Hungarian Jews.

The War Department dismissed the idea mostly because it would have diverted air support that was being used in other air battles – and thus might have extended the war.

In any case, Rubinstein argues, "there were no fewer than seven separate railway lines from Hungary to Auschwitz, each of which fed into the Lvov-Auschwitz route at different points." Bombing one line wouldn't have changed the fate of Hungarian Jews.

He also says that as for bombing Auschwitz itself, "the United States Air Force totally lacked the intelligence base necessary to plan and execute a bombing raid against the Auschwitz extermination camp."

Although he concurs with historians that American bombers were indeed carrying out raids at this time on industrial targets only a few miles away from the Auschwitz gas chambers, "all such strategic raids on military-industrial bases proceeded only after months of preparatory intelligence work."

Even if they could have bombed Auschwitz, it would have been a very different task than bombing a military target where the main objective was to obliterate anything in sight. A raid of Auschwitz would have required a minimum death toll. Furthermore, computer guided missiles did not exist at the time. "Only 13 percent of bombs dropped in an average American Air Force bombing raid fell within 500 feet of their intended targets."

Rubinstein asserts that if the U.S. Air Force had bombed Auschwitz and many Jews had died in the raid, (as would have been likely), "one can readily imagine what the attitude of today's historians of 'rescue' would have been: the Allies would now be blamed for 'killing Jews' in a foolish and unnecessary way."

Rubinstein concludes by saying that that responsibility for the Holocaust lies solely and wholly with Hitler, the SS and their accomplices. "In searching for a rational explantation of modern history's greatest crime, it is important that we not assign guilt to those who are innocent."

Rubinstein's well-researched arguments throughout the book are very thought provoking. The work is bound to cause controversy and surely some of his arguments and sweeping statements can and will be counter-argued. Still, The Myth of Rescue (Routledge) is well worth the read.

Benny Goodman profiled on Bravo!

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Benny Goodman, the king of swing, shattered barriers at will. He was supposedly the first American pop icon. He was the first white band leader to hire a black. He was the first jazz musician to play in Carnegie Hall.

These facts emerge in Benny Goodman: Adventures in the Kingdom of Swing, a nearly one-hour documentary to be aired on the Bravo! channel on Sept. 23 at 10 p.m.

The film, an amalgam of file footage and interviews with colleagues and family members, traces Goodman's life from his birthplace in Chicago's Jewish ghetto to his status as one of America's preeminent cultural figures.

As we learn, Goodman was the eighth of 11 children, the son of a struggling tailor who thought that music could be Benny's ticket to success.

Goodman, who seemed to have been born with a clarinet in his mouth, took his first tenative step as a musician in an amateur synagogue band. Then, at the tender age of 15, he left home to join a professional band bound for California.

As they say, he never looked back. By the mid-1930s, when he was in his 20s, Goodman had launched his up-and-coming career as a band leader with a nationally syndicated radio program called Let's Dance.

Capitalizing on his fame, he embarked on a series of exhausting one-nighters at clubs across the United States. Building on his fame,

MISSIONS, MUSEUMS & CRUISES

Mission to Israel:

The American United Jewish Appeal's Ometz Mission to Israel is the first designed to attract participants with mobility impairments.

The Nov. 5 to 14 mission is meant for people 25 to 45 who use manual wheelchairs, power wheelchairs, scooters, walkers or canes. Participants will "float on the Dead Sea, welcome Shabbat at the Kotel, view Masada, explore underground archeological excavations, visit Tel Aviv, tour Beit Shean, ride horses in the Galilee, visit Tiberias, cruise Lake Kinneret, ride along the Golan and visit Sefat." 212-880-1316.

Two European Notes:

• The British Tourism Authority (BTA) has published Britain By Choice, a catalogue of all BTA publications available for a nominal postage charge. There are accommodation guides to London and other cities, good maps, listings of bed and breakfast hotels, and specialty publications on walking tours, tracing your ancestors, shopping and other topics. 416-925-6326.

• The German National Tourist Office (GNTO) has reissued its useful and popular 34-page booklet, Travel Information on Germany. It's available for free from the GNTO, 175 Bloor St. E., North Tower, Suite 604, Toronto M4W 3R8, 416-968-1986, e-mail [germanto@idirecto.com].

Three Cruises:

Travel Talk has received word of three cruises, two for Jewish singles and the third for fans of Jewish music. All focus on the Caribbean.

From Dec. 3 to 13, the St. Louis Jewish Community Association and Brentwood Travel are sponsoring their second annual cruise for Jewish singles in their middle years. The Holland America ship Ryndam departs Ft. Lauderdale and visits St. Maarten, St. Lucia, Barbados, Guadeloupe, U.S. Virgin Islands, Nassau and other ports of call. 314-532-5515.

The Jewish Community Centre of Pittsburgh holds its fifth annual national singles cruise, Dec. 7 to 14 aboard Royal Caribbean's Enchantment of the Seas. Open to singles in their 20s, 30s and 40s, the cruise departs Miami for Playa Del Carmen, Mexico, Cozumel, Ocho Rios, Jamaica and Georgetown, Grand Cayman. 412-521- 8011, ext. 371.

Sailing Jan. 11 to 18, 1998, a glatt-kosher seven-night cruise aboard the Celebrity ship Mercury features a rich program of chassidic, cantorial, Yiddish, Sephardi-Ladino and klezmer music with outstanding singers. Departs Ft. Lauderdale to Key West, Cozumel, Montego Bay and Grand Cayman.

Four Museums:

• The Museum of Jewish Heritage – A Living Memorial To The Holocaust opened recently in Battery Park City, Manhattan, with N.Y. Governor George Pataki, U.S. Senator Al D'Amato, New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, former mayor Ed Koch and honorary guest Elie Wiesel in attendance.

The permanent exhibition contains 2,000 photographs, 800 artifacts and 24 original videos chronicling pre-Holocaust Jewish life, the Nazi era and post-war Jewish renewal. The museum is located at 18 First Place, Battery Park City, Manhattan.

• At the National Museum of American Jewish Military History in Washington D.C., an exhibition on the life and career of US Navy Commodore Uriah Phillips Levy (1792-1862) continues to next July.

An associate of Thomas Jefferson, Levy was court-martialed for refusing to inflict corporal punishment, but President Tyler overturned the decision. By the end of his career, he rose to command the U.S. Mediterranean fleet. 1811 R Street NW, Washington DC. 212-265-6280. Web site [http://www.penfed.org/jwv/home.htm].

• The Spertus Museum in Chicago features many exhibitions. One that opens this week is on contemporary American artist Adam Siegel, whose work incorporates pages from archival letters and books from centuries past, including some in Yiddish. 618 S. Michigan Ave. 312-322-1747.

• Lubomi, a 600-year-old Jewish shtetl destroyed in the Shoah, lives again in an exhibition of some 100 photographs, 40 documents and other memorabilia in the Valley of the Communities at Yad Vashem, Jerusalem. The exhibition Lubomi, A Small Jewish World continues through March 1998.

Benny Goodman profiled

he appeared in several Hollywood films. He was, as the narrarator observes, a man in "perpetual motion."

Judging by comments elicited from his daughter and colleagues, Goodman was extremely self-absorbed, ambitious to the point of being obsessive and nothing less than a perfectionist.

In an era when Jim Crow restrictions prevailed, Goodman hired two black musicians, one of whom was the irrepressible Lionel Hampton. In this sense, Goodman was a great civil rights champion.

Being a taskmaster, Goodman regularly changed personnel. But the soothing sound of his band remained uniquely constant.

330 OBITUARIES

Passed away suddenly on Aug. 26, 1997, Henry Weinberg, beloved husband of Honey (Hanka) Weinberg, devoted father of Nancy Dahlke & Bella Allen, father-in-law of Larry Dahlke & David Allen, loved grandfather of Joelle, Sarah and Rebecca Allen, Adam and Erin Dahlke. Henry arrived in Canada in 1948 from Poland with $1.00 in his pocket and a wife and child at his side. He was a man of boundless energy, determination and drive, who loved life and all its adventure. "Saba" flew his own airplane, drove his own Harley and para-sailed. He was a great supporter of many charitable organizations, and his community at large. He was a man of great generosity & geniality who opened his arms to anyone who needed a hand.He revelled in his business success and in his family's love.We will all miss him greatly

Israel & the Jewish World

History of suicide bombings

By MITCHELL DANOW
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Following is a list of suicide bombings carried out against Israel since Israel and the Palestinians signed peace accords in September 1993. It does not include the numerous drive-by shootings and stabbings. The death tolls refer only to the victims and do not include the bombers.

1994

April 6 — A 19-year-old member of Hamas carries out a suicide car- bombing at a bus stop in the northern Israeli town of Afula. Eight people are killed and more than 50 are wounded.

April 13 — A Hamas suicide bomber detonates an explosive aboard an Israeli commuter bus in the central town of Hadera. Five Israelis are killed, another 30 are wounded.

Oct. 19 — A Hamas suicide bomber sets off an explosion on a Dan bus traveling north along Dizengoff Street in the heart of Tel Aviv's shopping district. The blast kills 22 people and wounds 42 others.

Nov. 12 — A Hamas suicide bomber riding a bicycle detonates an explosion at an army checkpoint near the Netzarim settlement in Gaza. Three Israeli soldiers are killed, 11 others are wounded.

1995

Jan. 22 — Two Palestinian suicide bombers detonate explosions at the Beit Lid intersection between Netanya and the West Bank town of Tulkarm, killing 22 and wounding about 60. Islamic Jihad claims responsibility.

April 9 — A suicide bomber belonging to Islamic Jihad drives his explosive-laden van into an Egged bus near the Kfar Darom settlement in the Gaza Strip, blowing up the bus. Seven Israeli soldiers, along with American student Alisa Flatow, are killed in the bus explosion.

Two hours later, a Hamas suicide bomber attacks an Israeli convoy near the Netzarim settlement, blowing up an Israeli border police jeep, but succeeding in killing only himself. More than 50 people are wounded in both attacks.

July 24 — A suicide bomber blows up a Dan bus outside Tel Aviv's 40-story Diamond Exchange, killing six and wounding 32. Hamas claims responsibility, saying one of its members from the West Bank carried out the attack.

Aug. 21 — A Hamas suicide bomber detonates an explosion on the No. 26 bus in Jerusalem's northern neighborhood of Ramat Eshkol, killing four people and injuring more than 100. Among the dead is American Joan Davenny, 47, a teacher at a Jewish school in Woodbridge, Conn.

Nov. 2 — Two suicide bombers detonate explosions a minute apart near two buses in nearby locations in Gaza. Eleven Israelis are lightly-wounded in the first attack, none in the second. The attacks are believed to come in retaliation for the Oct. 26 assassination of Islamic Jihad leader Fathi Shakaki in Malta. Islamic Jihad claims responsibility for both attacks.

1996

Feb. 25 — Hamas suicide bomber blows up a No. 18 bus near Jerusalem's central bus station, killing 26 people and wounding 48 others. Americans Matthew Eisenfeld of Hartford, Conn., and Sara Duker of Teaneck, N.J., are among the dead.

Less than an hour later, a second Hamas suicide bomb explodes at a soldiers' hitchhiking station near Ashkelon, killing one and injuring 31 others. The two attacks are said to be in retaliation for the Jan. 5, 1996, slaying in Gaza of Yehiya Ayash, a Hamas fugitive known as "The Engineer" because of his expertise with explosives.

March 3 — A Hamas suicide bomber blows up a bus on Jerusalem's Jaffa Road, killing 19 people and leaving at least nine wounded. The attack takes place on the same No. 18 bus line and almost at the same time as the previous week's attack.

March 4 — A suicide bomb is detonated in Tel Aviv's Dizengoff Centre, killing 13, including children, and wounding at least 130 on the eve of Purim. Hamas claims responsibility.

1997

March 21 — A Hamas suicide bomber detonates his explosion at the Cafe Apropos in central Tel Aviv, killing three Israelis and wounding 47 others.

July 30 — Two suicide bombers strike in the Machane Yehuda open-air market in Jerusalem, claiming at least 12 victims and wounding at least 150 others. Islamic Jihad reportedly claims responsibility.

Sept. 4 — Three suicide bombers detonate near-simultaneous explosions at the Ben Yehuda pedestrian mall in downtown Jerusalem, killing five people and wounding more than 190.

Jewish tennis pro getting better all the time

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — After taking her first lessons in tennis at age five, Sarah Pitkowski of France knew that tennis would be more than a hobby to her.

By the time she was 17, Pitkowski excelled in tennis. She had perfected a strong baseline game which helped her win the 1992 French national 18s championships. The following year, she continued to dominate in Europe, winning the European Championship 18s and a silver medal for France at the 1993 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

"At that point, I felt that I wanted to be the best tennis player in the world. By turning pro in 1993, I would only get better by competing against the best players in the world," said Pitkowki, who competed recently at the $1.5-million du Maurier Canadian Open at the National Tennis Centre at York University.

In her first round match against Alexandra Fusai of France, Pitkowki was overwelmed by her opponent 6-1, 6-0 and had over 30 unforced errors.

"To say the least, I had a horrible match, but I have always been able to produce a winning result after a poorly played loss. I want to stay confident and focused on improving my ranking," said Pitkowski, who is currently ranked 60th in the world and is the top ranked Jewish player on the women's pro circuit.

Despite her poor showing in Toronto, Pitkowski, 22, seems destined to become one of the best young players to come from France. Her speed, patience on the court and excellent backhand shots have paid off in raising her rankings since she turned pro in 1993.

Thus far in her career, Pitkowski has won six satellite events and was a quarter-finalist in three major tournaments.

In 1997, Pitkowski won her first pro title in Reims by defeating five opponents, including Ilsa Krivenchea of Czechoslovakia, 7-5, 6-1 in the final.

Perhaps the best test for Pitkowski is her ability to give the top players tough competitive matches before losing. For example, Pitkowski fought Monica Seles on the baseline at the French Open losing 6-3, 7-5 in the second round, and extended Amanda Coetzer of South Africa to a tiebreaker in the second set, losing 6-4, 7-6 in the quarter-finals at Bolivia.

Pitkowski has earned $68,500 so far in 1997 and will likely be representing France at the next Federation Cup in 1998.

* * *

Tennis Lines: Anna Smasnova of Israel, a former Soviet Jew who competed at the 1995 Canadian Open in Toronto, is currently ranked 182nd on the pro circuit. Her low ranking prevented her entry at this year's Canadian Open.

Shiera Stuart of Vancouver, Canada's top ranked Jewish female player, won a bronze at the 1997 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

More than $20,000 was raised at the Ruth Taub Memorial Tennis Classic held at the Richmond Hills Country Club in June. Taub, a Holocaust survivor who died in 1994, was an avid tennis player who wanted to have tennis scholarships to encourage girls to pursue tennis. One of this year's winners of a tennis scholarship was Helena Vander of Toronto who represented Canada on the women's tennis team at the 1997 Maccabiah Games.

Top Jewish tennis players competing at the U.S. Open, in addition to Pitkowski and Smashnova are Gaston Etlis (Argentina) and Gabriel Silberstein (Chile).

ROGER NEILSON COMES TO METULLA

Thirty-two youngsters, 14 Canadian and 18 Israeli, had the opportunity to skate, learn, and play under the watchful and caring eye of Roger Neilson, former Toronto Maple Leafs coach and presently the associate coach of the St. Louis Blues. The hockey hopefuls also benefited from the tutelage of Bill Lindsay of the Florida Panthers and Alex Andjelic, one of Europe's top hockey coaches. The hockey clinic was sponsored by the United Israel Appeal of Canada. [UIA photo]

Racquetball champ undeterred

By MYRON LOVE
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Canadian racquetball champion Sherman Greenfeld describes his defeat in the recent Canadian championships as a setback that will make him hungrier and push him to come back even stronger next year.

The Winnipeg-based Greenfeld, 34, lost his bid for his 10th consecutive Canadian championship to Toronto's Mike Ceresia, 34.

Sherman Greenfeld

Although he admits he felt some pressure for his 10th crown before a hometown crowd, Greenfeld maintains he was feeling mentally and physically tough and played a strong game throughout. Prior to the finals, his record against Ceresia was 13-2.

"Mike plays an intelligent game just as I do," Greenfeld said. "A big part of my game is my serve but I came out a little flat. I have to give Mike credit though. He took my game away."

Greenfeld still has his eye on the Pan Am Games scheduled for Winnipeg in 1999. To build up to the games, he is looking for a corporate sponsor to help support him on the American Pro Tour.

"The best training is to compete and the best players are on the U.S. circuit," he said. "I own a few pro shops in the city but I can get someone to run them while I'm away."

CORRECTION

In the story on Maccabi junior medal winners last week, the name of one winner was incorrect, the result of information supplied to The CJN. The name of the silver medal winner in doubles tennis for boys aged 15-16 was David Srour.

The Inside Back

Judged by size of child's album

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

I had a very vivid dream recently. I was in court, sitting in the witness box, being sued by my youngest child. The charge was photographic neglect. Her lawyer was none other than my oldest son.

Naturally, being a dream, I had decided to save some money and defend myself, having figured I knew enough jargon from television law shows to get myself out of any predicament. But my confidence began to wane as I looked around the courtroom. The jury was made up of my youngest child's classmates, and Judge Ito was presiding. My chances did not look very good.

My son the lawyer began his case. He introduced Exhibit A, a three-inch thick photo album, calligraphically labelled "David's first year." Under his relentless questioning (I was shepping such nachas from the job he did, even if it was doing damage to my defence), I pointed out pictures in triplicate of him in the hospital, sleeping, his brit, drooling, being fed solids, sitting, crawling, getting his diaper changed, weekly updates. And that was only Volume one. Volumes two and three continued through his first year, his second year, his third year. My explanations for such excesses were the novelty of having a first child, ample time and financial resources to match.

Next he introduced Exhibit B. It was a considerably slimmer album on which the typed label read "Ilan, 1993-1999." Under questioning, I was able to identify, in sequence, a picture of Ilan at the hospital, sometime during the brit, sitting up, then a bathtub shot, taking his first steps (more or less), his first birthday party, second birthday party, his first day of school. Asked to explain the apparent volume discrepancies between Exhibits A and B, I tried to counter that it wasn't that we loved Ilan any less, he wouldn't sit still for a picture and my camera couldn't shoot at faster than 1/200th of a second. Then we had switched mostly to video, our lives got busier, we wanted to avoid competition and sibling rivalry, the camera broke ..." I was beginning to shake.

Finally, he introduced Exhibit C, a still slimmer album with "Adina, 1995-2012" scrawled on the front. I began to sweat profusely. My goose was cooked, and I knew it. "And, Mr. Max" my son the lawyer boomed, zeroing in for the kill. "Would you please explain to the jury why it took 17 years to fill a 20-picture photo album?"

Guilty of photographic neglect

I needed more excuses desperately. I tried explaining that she had just developed faster and did everything sooner than her brothers, that we were so bogged down with equipment we couldn't take the camera with us on trips, then that they stopped making film, and that I never had the time to actually put the developed pictures in the album with all the activity in our lives..." I broke down on the stand and pleaded for the mercy of the court.

The jury only took 20 minutes, including a bathroom and snack break, to reach its verdict. Guilty of photographic neglect. Judge Ito set the claim at $10 million and eternal guilt. The courtroom erupted in cheers from children and tears from parents. I awoke in a sweat and upon reorienting myself, got out the camera and frantically began taking pictures of my daughter sleeping in her crib, first the left side, then the right...

LIGHT HONEY CAKE WITH CINNAMON AND WALNUTS

1 1/2 tsp. instant coffee granules
6 tblsps. hot water
1 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground ginger
pinch of ground cloves
2 large eggs
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup honey
1/3 cup vegetable oil
1/2 cup walnuts, coarsely chopped

Lightly grease 8x4" loaf pan, line with parchment paper or wax paper, grease paper. In cup, dissolve coffee in hot water. Let cool. Sift flour with baking powder, baking soda, cinnamon, ginger and cloves. Beat eggs lightly. Add sugar and honey and beat until mixture is very smooth and light in colour. Gradually add oil and beat until blended. Stir in flour mixture alternately in 2 batches with coffee. Stir in walnuts. Pour batter into prepared pan and bake in preheated 325°F oven for 50-55 minutes, or until cake tester inserted comes out clean. Cool in pan for 15 minutes. Turn out onto rack and carefully peel off paper. Wrap in foil when competely cool. Yield: 8-10 servings.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My sister-in-law Rachel recently had quadruple bypass surgery and is recuperating at a convalescent home. Today, Tuesday, the nurse told me that Rachel will be discharged on the weekend. There are several problems. Rachel only speaks Russian, is on welfare and there is no one else to help her when she gets home. I have a terrible back problem and I work full time. I can do the cooking but I cannot do anything else for Rachel. I cannot afford to hire someone. What shall I do?

FE

Dear FE,

First contact the social service department at the convalescent home and ensure that there is a discharge plan for Rachel before she returns home. This plan should identify what her restrictions will be due to her physical condition. She will need home care for the aids to daily living (ADL) that she cannot do for herself. If it is not available through medicare, call your community agency for help and/or for help to advocate on Rachel's behalf.

Make sure that you encourage Rachel to do what she can and that you do not take over all the responsibility.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

"Boutique Hotel" offers many wedding benefits

Making sure that a wedding goes well involves hundreds of details. Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will take care of them all under one roof, meaning less stress on the wedding party, and more enjoyment for everyone — bride, groom, family and friends.

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto hosts wedding parties of 40 to 180 people, starting at $83.00 per guest, plus gratuity and taxes.

When you book your function at this marvelously mid-sized downtown hotel, which offers self parking after 6 p.m. for all guests of the bridal party, you'll find something special in store for both bride and groom.

The festivities begin at 6 p.m. with a one-hour cocktail reception featuring complimentary piano player, open bar and hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. This is followed by an elegant four-course dinner with imported wine, and sparkling wine afterwards for toasts. There is a four-hour host bar after dinner, and coffee and tea service at midnight.

Also, the bride and groom receive one free room on the wedding night for every $1,000 spent, to a maximum of five nights. For example, if there are 70 guests at $83 each, totalling $5,810, there would be five complimentary rooms for the bride and groom to offer family and friends. (These figures do not include taxes and gratuity.)

Rates start at $195 for a single or double room, with special rates during the slow season. When they arrive on their wedding night, the bride and groom receive a complimentary suite and chilled champagne. Before setting out next morning on their honeymoon, they are served a continental breakfast (sliced fruit, Danish pastry, croissants and coffee).

If you wish, Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will be pleased to organize every aspect of your wedding within the domain of the hotel, from flowers to entertainment. The catering manager will attend to every detail to ensure all goes smoothly. This level of service is in keeping with Hotel Inter-Continental's profile: it's a "boutique hotel" for individual business travellers, families, intimates and small groups (and possibly a celebrity or two in search of privacy and quiet).

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto is located at 220 Bloor Street West, just west of Avenue Road, across from the Royal Conservatory of Music. For more information, ask for the catering manager at (416) 324-5884.

Mister Disc Jockey, Aristocrats Among D.J.'s

For your wedding, Mister Disc Jockey Company offers more than just the services of a D.J. Their motto is "total seamless entertainment": good music, elegant presentation and a rapport between their team and the other professionals at your wedding.

At a wedding, with its unique blend of solemnity and joy, entertainers must respect decorum (or as Ed McMurtry, Mister Disc Jockey's Creative Director, puts it, "err on the side of elegance"), be original and unique besides. The Mister Disc Jockey Company welcomes these special demands.

Gone is the scruffy guy crouched behind his tape deck, or the 17 year-old standing on a speaker yelling at the guests. The professional entertainers at Mister Disc Jockey stand in front of their equipment where they are visible. Aristocrats among D.J.'s, they wear tuxedos — both for elegance, and because the tux imparts authority, so they can help with public announcements, keep order amongst rambunctious kids, etc.

While a wedding, with its slow, dignified pace, is less interactive than, say a bar mitzvah, each guest should feel that they are a part of the celebration. Moreover, the entertainment must please both spouses, friends and extended families, from young children to grandparents.

The Mister Disc Jockey Company knows how to establish rapport. To take requests, for example, their D.J.'s mingle unobtrusively from table to table, introducing themselves and putting people at ease. They also provide quality entertainment matched to your taste, and they work closely with every other professional at your wedding, from caterer to florist, to unify them in an harmonious whole. They, like the entertainers, also see themselves as artists and they excel in an atmosphere of mutual respect.

They have ample experience with special situations, says Andrew Proctor, the Production Manager at Mister Disc Jockey. Suppose the wedding is outdoors or in a tent where there may be a need to augment the power supply: Mister Disc Jockey sees to it that not only they, but the videographers, caterers and others have the electricity they need.

The resulting smoother co-ordination also minimizes stress, both before and at the wedding. Seamless entertainment requires detailed planning and dealing with the unpredictable or unexpected. For example if the client comes up with a new idea at the last moment Mister Disc Jockey can usually make necessary adjustments immediately.

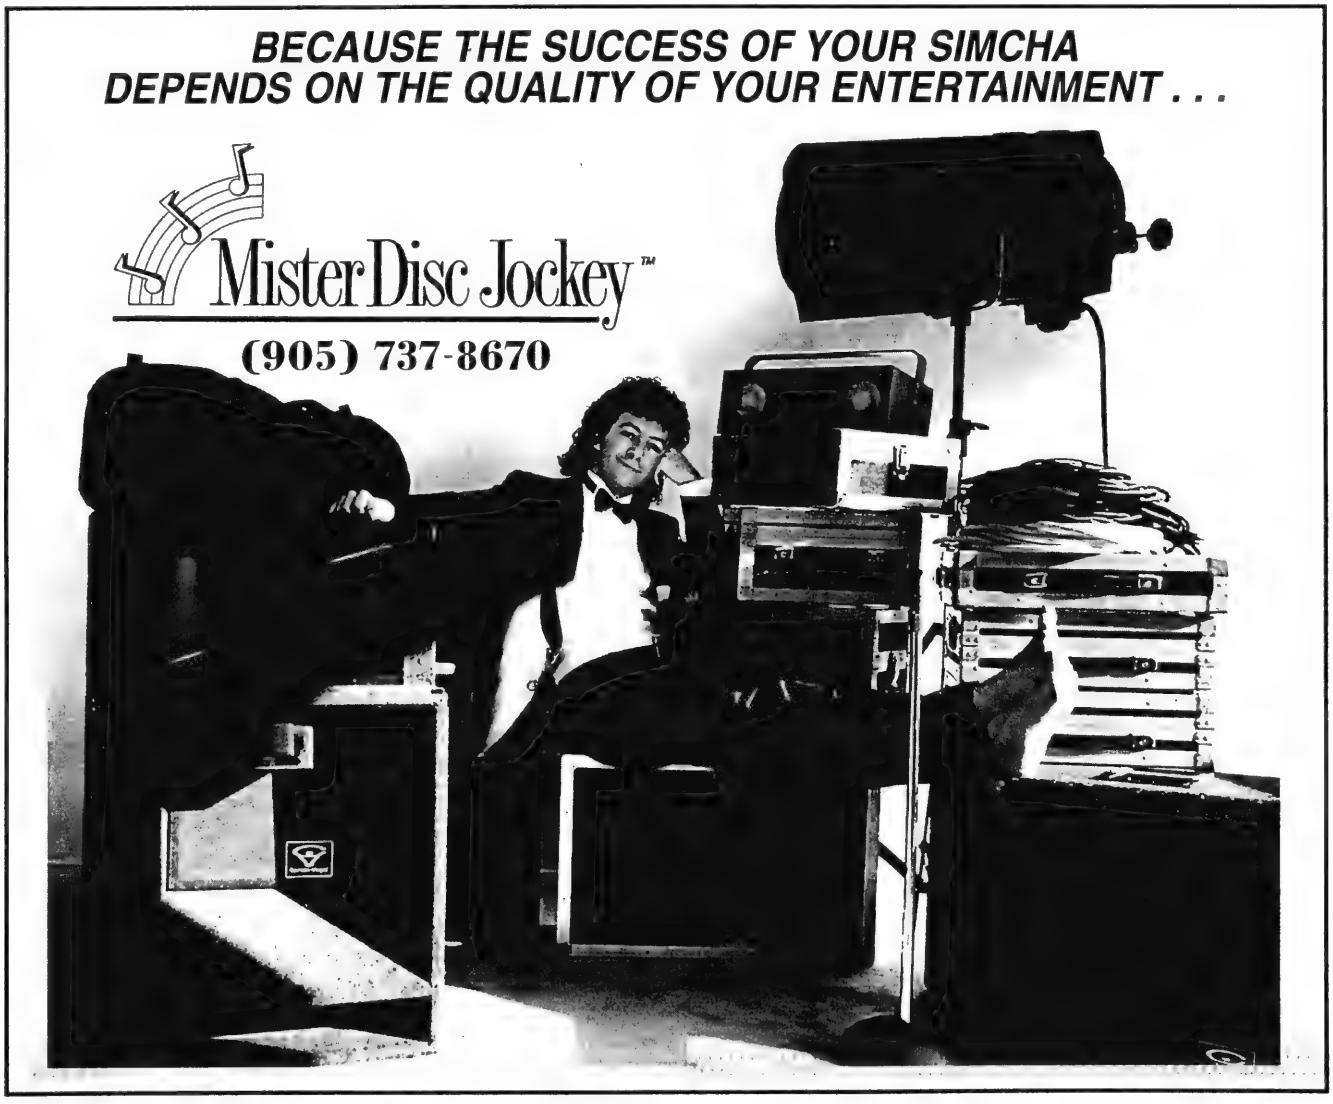
Providing entertainment and other services for celebrations of all kinds is a complex and growing industry and The Mister Disc Jockey Company has not only built up a vast local network, but also has extensive experience at the national and international level. For example, the International Marketing Manager of Bride Magazine had The Mister Disc Jockey Company at her wedding in the U.S. making a fashion statement that a D.J. can be elegant.

Are you undecided about whether to hire a disc jockey or live entertainment? The Mister Disc Jockey Company works well with live performers, allowing their talent to shine while filling in all the gaps. Worried about getting good speaker volume without overwhelming your guests? The Mister Disc Jockey Company uses speaker placement and professional equipment to ensure the highest possible sound quality at the right volume.

McMurtry also places great value on co-ordination with the caterer. For example, if there is dancing between the courses, his team and the caterer synchronize their work so the food appears at the right moment, with the alteration of dance and background music exactly timed.

Details are of the essence, Andrew Proctor advises. Give your entertainers a clear idea of what you want and encourage their creative input. Plan as far in advance as possible, leaving the smaller details no later than a month to two weeks before your wedding date. Advance planning ensures quality entertainment at a modest price.

The ultimate measure of success for your wedding will be simple. Do your guests stay as late as they can? The Mister Disc Jockey Company's satisfied clients will tell you they will; but don't take their word for it. Call Mister Disc Jockey: (905) 737-8670.



Bronson's takes pride in the satisfied bride

As proprietor Ilene Bronsteter says, Bronson's China and Gifts is "a customer-oriented company" which has earned its reputation for service in the Toronto area and across Canada. Service is essential to success in any business, especially one where people are choosing products which express their hopes and dreams for the future. Bronson's satisfied customers not only come back: they recommend their favourite china and gift store to friends and family, and bring them along.

Bronson's opened its spacious 7,000 sq. ft. Thornhill store in 1979. For better service to midtown customers, the 3,000 sq. ft. Lawrence Plaza location was added in 1996.

For gifts you will treasure decades after the wedding, join the thousands who have turned to Bronson's Bridal Registry — one of Canada's best. There is a huge selection of quality china, dinnerware, flatware, stemware, kitchen items, decorative giftware, and accessories like tablecloths and placemats; and Bronson's pricing policy is designed to match every budget and taste.

Contemporary and traditional patterns from around the world include name brands such as Mikasa, Villeroy and Boch, Rosenthal, Noritake, Wedgwood, Fitz & Floyd, and Royal Doulton. There is also a unique selection of hand-painted ceramic designs.

Bronson's friendly, knowledgeable consultants help you pick patterns and co-ordinate table settings, so that your tableware enhances your new lifestyle. The atmosphere is relaxed; you and your guests are welcome to take as much time as you need to make your selections. "Your guests are our guests too," Ilene smiles.

Bronson's offers not only the best prices in gifts and china, but a range of special services which include gift wrapping, same-day delivery and telephone ordering. Stock is constantly updated; and because the inventory and Bridal Registry are computerized, service is prompt and your list is always up to date.

Bronson's Thornhill store, at 2 Steeles Ave. West, is open Monday—Saturday 9:30—5:30, Thursday till 9, and Sunday 12 noon—5; phone (905) 881-9930. The Lawrence Plaza location is open Monday—Thursday 10—9, Friday and Saturday 10—6, and Sunday 12 noon—5; phone (416) 256-9930. For cross-Canada orders, call toll-free: 1-800-387-2766.

Deblins Linens offers brides "boutique quality at warehouse prices"

The Chitiz family of Deblins Linens, with 49 years in the linen trade, have the knowledge and experience that enable them to offer what president Ellis Chitiz calls "boutique quality at warehouse prices".

Deblins is a family business with a dedicated staff who maintain a level of service that keeps regular customers coming back. Deblins also draws many referrals, including hard-to-convince customers who comparison shop before they decide.

When the Chitiz family created their warehouse Superstore at 39 Orfus Rd. in 1994, they wanted to offer their customers the four things which had enabled their business to grow over the years: quality of merchandise, selection, low prices, and service.

Bridal registry solutions

At Deblins Linens, you will find exactly what you want and need in a huge variety of bedding, table linens, bathware and accessories — and helpful, well-informed staff to answer all your questions and advise you on matters like color coordination. You'll find this especially useful when arranging your bridal registry. By the time you're done at Deblins, your "home sweet home" will be much more than a figure of speech.

Need sheets? If it covers a bed and it's fine quality, Deblins has it, in a full range of sizes, patterns and colors. They carry Wamsutta, Croscill, Revman, Crown Craft, Springmaid, Fieldcrest and other brand names, including the Veratex line which is printed in Israel. New styles of sheets, like the T-shirt style that's now in hot demand, are constantly being introduced. There are even sheets for odd-sized mattresses.

Deblins' wide assortment of ready-made drapes, curtains and valances are chosen to match all sheet designs — thus making it easier for you to beautify your entire home by buying all your dry goods at Deblins.

Prices so low they don't even offer discounts to designers

There is an abundant stock of first-quality pillow coverings, duvets and duvet covers, with six different styles of duvets, and nine different styles of pillows. White Canadian goose down duvets are available in all weights and sizes, at exceptional prices, and with a host of complementary coverings.

How about towels? Deblins' vast selection includes Fieldcrest Royal Velvet, stocked in 24 colours, and matching accessories. For those who prefer patterns, there are Jacquard towels and printed towels — all quality brand names, always at the lowest possible prices.

There are plenty of bath accessories, like soap dishes, tumblers, tissue and lotion dispensers, and toothbrush holders, all of which can be coordinated with the towels. Of course, there is also a wide assortment of shower curtains, linens and mats.

If you're looking for tablecloths, napkins, napkin rings and table pads for your Sabbath table or everyday dining, you can find them at Deblins. In this department too, the top brand names are always in stock, at the lowest prices anywhere.

In fact, Deblins prices are so low they don't even offer discounts to designers. At the same time, they carry only the best quality — no irregulars or seconds. For this reason, Deblins does not match prices: "If you can find it cheaper elsewhere," says Ellis Chitiz, "buy it." He is confident that when you compare price and quality, you will find that Deblins offers the better deal.

Sabbath table well covered

"When you walk out of our door, " says Ellis, "you will be carrying quality linen, at probably the best price in the city; and you will definitely have enjoyed the best service. If you have a problem with any one of these three, let me know."

Along with quality, selection and pricing, Deblins adheres to the tradition of personal service. If you have any questions about product or fabric care, staff will answer them promptly and expertly. In the rare event you don't find what you want or need in stock, staff will order it for you, or custom-make it at an excellent price.

Deblins' largest store is the Superstore at 39 Orfus Rd., with 10,000 square feet of merchandise: (416) 782-2910. In addition, Deblins has stores in the Promenade Mall at Bathurst and Centre St., (905) 709-0007, and the Mississauga Home and Design Centre at Winston Churchill and Dundas St., (905) 820-1509. All three stores are open seven days a week.

IF YOU FIND LINEN AT A BETTER PRICE ANYWHERE ELSE

A lot of stores today offer a price guarantee. That means if you find a lower price anywhere else, they'll match it. So after running around to find a better price, all you're left with is the option to pay the same price somewhere else.

But isn't the best price what you're really looking for? Then shop at Deblins Linens. We don't match prices.

BUY IT

Our goal is to offer you the lowest price in the first place. Sure, you might find an odd item at a lower price in another store, but don't come rushing back to Deblins to pay the same price. Just buy it. We're confident that when you compare both quality and price, nine times out of ten you'll get the better deal at Deblins .... not just the same deal.

A SHOW of HANDS
OFFERS BASIC REGISTRY

A Show of Hands is a contemporary craft gallery offering truly exceptional one of a kind pieces from hand blown glass to ceramics, inspired Judaica to jewellery. They specialize in alternative gift registries and corporate awards.

What is an alternative registry? Gallery director Sara Levine-Petroff explains, "it's a wish list, to either augment a conventional registry, or chosen in lieu of it. The comment I hear most often is 'I wish I had known you had bridal registry when I was getting married'!" Today, many couples are getting married after establishing their careers, and may have already accumulated the household basics. Now is the time to begin an art collection. Look for original, signed contemporary craft works that will continue to bring your life meaning as the years go by. A marriage of form & function means pieces can be used when entertaining. The works inherently create conversation. Each signed piece is accompanied by an artist biography.

After 14 years, A Show of Hands Contemporary Craft Gallery has become the choice destination for exceptional, inspired gifts. If you have never been there, treat yourself and be sure to stop in before you consider registering anywhere.

A 10% discount is extended on all attendants' gifts when registering at the gallery.

At Stavros, a maestro sets the standard

Sometimes, the highest praise comes from a competitor. A former salesman at Stavros Master Tailor & Shirtmaker, after years with another clothier, recently told manager Robert Kennedy: "If our customers knew what you do at Stavros, they'd be lining up at your door."

Master tailor Stavros Theodoropoulos wants to do more than sell suits. He wants you to come back — and bring friends who, like you, insist on quality. He and his staff love their work, and the satisfaction that comes from doing their best.

STAVROS
MASTER TAILOR & SHIRTMAKER

"While I teach, I learn"

For three years after you buy your suit, Stavros offers complimentary cleaning and hand pressing. Having made custom clothing for decades, he takes pride in how his suits look fresh after years of wear.

Stavros is the conductor of a small orchestra of fine tailors, each with his own specialty. The maestro co-ordinates their work, while teaching them everything his experience has taught him. He still does the most challenging jobs himself; and he is always learning new fine points. As he says, quoting Socrates: "While I teach, I learn."

When Stavros or Robert Kennedy stroll along Yorkville or Cumberland, they wear what they make; so, because a finely dressed man or woman always stands out, Stavros' best advertising is the product itself. "We sell us," Robert smiles. What you wear tells the world how you see yourself — and a Stavros suit tells a compelling story. It is crafted to match you: your body build, tastes, and the season and milieu in which you wear it.

Now is the time to start thinking of fall fabrics and colors. What about a fine wool-and-cashmere-blend sports jacket — or if you're going south, a wool-and-silk combination? Thinking even further ahead? Stavros makes overcoats, on up to two months' notice.

Stavros, an innovator, has set the trend to the resurgent British-style silhouette look: the suit compliments your natural figure, with a crisp cut to highlight the set of your shoulders. Double-breasted suits and three-button jackets with side vents are back.

Stavros is as careful in choice of fabric as in fitting, cutting and stitching. His showroom displays not only fine garments, but bolts of fine cloth fresh from the loom. For example, he uses grades of wool from super 100's up to super 150's (the higher the count, the finer the fabric). The world's finest mills are represented here: Wain & Sheill, Scabal, Holland & Sherry, Delfino, Zegna, Loro Piana, and Dormeuil.

The maestro conducts a small orchestra of fine tailors

Once you own a Stavros suit, you're a devoted customer; but the proof is in the wearing. So drop in to 95 Cumberland St., on the south side east of Bellair; or call (416) 924-8144 for an appointment.

The proof is in the wearing

In-Stock: Wm. Ashley carries more patterns in-stock on an everyday basis than anyone else. This means that your selection will usually available for your guest to take with them.

Computerized Registry Listings: When you register, your selection will be recorded in our computerized Bridal Registry. We can advise your family and friends of your personal preferences. This reduces duplication by ensuring everything you receive is your personal choice.

Unique Designs: We bring you an unequalled selection of famous manufacturers from around the world, many of which are available only at William Ashley.

Knowledgeable Consultants: Our registry consultants are experts at setting the most unique and exciting tables. They will help you choose the settings that reflect your combined tastes and new lifestyle.

Complimentary Services: We offer our registered couples a wide range of special services, all provided without charge. Free registry consultations, free gift notification service, free gift wrapping and free delivery among others (see store for details).

Gourmet Shoppe: We carry a complete selection of everything you will need for your kitchen. From pots and pans to electric appliances, kitchen knives, cookware and every gadget you can imagine, Wm. Ashley has it all under one roof.

Internet Access: As part of our special services to our registered couples, your guests will be able to view your requests from the comfort of their home and make a selection of their choice. Each couple will be issued a personal web site address to give to your friends and family for their convenience.

Welcome to the House of Shiseido...Your Beauty Destination

Every bride wants to be the beautiful blushing bride from the time you leave your home for the ceremony to the time you leave your reception. You want the skills to apply your own makeup and keep it fresh throughout the day.

You will find the professionals, who will teach you these skills at the Shiseido Beauty Institute located right here in Toronto. Shiseido's Beauty Team consists of Debbie Cooper, Julie Wong and Jane Palmer who will book you a Bridal Makeup Seminar, free of charge. The Beauty Team will devote their time and knowledge to you and your bridal party.

When you book your seminar appointment, the Shiseido Beauty Instructors will ask you about the aspects and specifics of your wedding day. What colours and textures are the gowns? Where will the photos be taken? Are they in black and white or are they in colour? Shiseido will take into consideration the lighting, overall theme of your wedding and customize the seminar especially for you.

The ambiance is relaxed and friendly, spacious and bright with a spectacular view of the city from the 24th floor of the Dundas Tower, situated at 1 Dundas St. West. Carson Reid-Phillips, Shiseido Training Manager for Shiseido Canada says "Every seminar is private, for you and your party only, so that each of you are able to enjoy individual attention". He emphasized that you will not just be told, but be shown what to do: and learn by doing.

You, the bride, are the "model"; the bridal party will watch you and participate with their own make up application. Alternatively, you may choose to have the instructor apply the makeup to one side of your face, while you work on the other. "Attention is paid to every detail of your face," says Beauty Instructor, Debbie Cooper.

Beauty Instructor Julie Wong begins the seminar by identifying your skin type and your party's skin type. Then you are shown how to apply concealer, foundation, and the actual makeup – all natural, healthy products. Finally, you learn how to give your makeup staying power with minimal touch-ups.

Uncover the secrets of your natural radiance, and then learn to enhance them with techniques that wed 125 years of beauty care experience with today's scientific knowledge. Let your beauty take everyone's breath away—and have the satisfaction of doing it all yourself.

At the end of the seminar, you receive a free booklet on skincare, and free samples of Shiseido's products, as a demonstration of Shiseido's commitment to Beauty, Science, and Well Being. There are no sales on site, just a continuous commitment to customer service and care.

The Shiseido Beauty Institute in the Dundas Tower is located at 1 Dundas St. West, Suite 2405. To book your Seminar, and learn about Shiseido's other products and services, call 416-408-3700. It's absolutely free!

Beth Emeth and Zuchter Berk Caterers: "A perfect wedding package"

Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue have been one of the most sought after kosher caterers in Toronto for 40 years,. They are well known for creating quality foods with special attention given to detail and presentation, along with a dedication to providing the superior service required to make your wedding impressive, memorable, and hassle-free.

The facilities at Beth Emeth lend themselves to a ceremony, cocktail hour, and dinner or luncheon reception, that flow naturally as your special day progresses. Beth Emeth Synagogue is completely accessible from the oversized Wilmington St. parking lot, or Elder St. entrance, into the chandeliered beautiful foyer where your guests are met with complimentary coat checking, linen dressed table with seating cards, and a warm and comfortable sanctuary or chapel setting in which to share your very special wedding ceremony.

A carpeted and mirrored bride's room is provided for only you, equipped with sofa and seating as well as your own private washroom and closet.

The elegant Fischtein Hall, located on the main level, just behind the sanctuary, can accommodate wedding parties of 150 to 450 people, including a large dance floor and raised stage for musicians. Upstairs (accessible by elevator or grand stairway) is a very pretty room, the Arback Hall, accommodating up to 150 people with full kitchen facilities.

Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers (Lorraine and David Berk), along with banquet manager Tim Nolin, have taken it upon themselves to personalize your event, creating your party and accommodating your budget.

Catering at Beth Emeth includes all linens, table set-up, and refreshments for the wedding party during your photography session.

For a more formal wedding, Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers are able to arrange for rentals of specialty linens and beautiful chair covers to enhance the ambiance of your wedding day.

Wedding package prices have been re-evaluated and are now presented with an all-inclusive price so that the price you see is all that you pay — no extras.

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue is also a perfect setting for engagement parties, bridal showers, and offruffs.

Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers also cater in your home for Friday night dinners, cocktail receptions, and brunches to accommodate your "out-of-towners".

To book a function at Beth Emeth please call the Synagogue office, 100 Elder St., (416) 633-3838.

Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers can be reached at their office, 1600 Steeles Ave. W., Ste. 227, (905) 738-6880.

From One Generation To The Next

Ritché. the name has come to mean "beautiful bride." For over 40 years, three generations of Canadian brides have had the Ritché family assist them with the most important decisions of their bridal attire.

After receiving his fashion training in Europe, Jack Ritché came to Canada, quickly establishing himself as a leading couturier designer. In the years that followed, he has outfitted international and local celebrities and thousands of brides from across the country.

In 1981, his daughter, Vivian, joined the family business, and soon after Ritché expanded to the present Avenue Road location.

Jack Ritché maintains his couturier status by still attending to mothers and brides, while his daughter, Vivian and her husband, Arthur, have come to oversee operations.

Vivian tells us, "Women of the 90's are smart and sophisticated. They are professionals and business people, who have come to appreciate value and service. We relate to our customers and strive to exceed their expectations. This is a very personal business and we really get to know our customers. They're like part of the family."

Just enter through the signatured double glass doors and you quickly realize that this is no ordinary store. Beautiful gowns and dresses are everywhere. The upper level, entirely dedicated to bridal wear, is adorned with testimonial thank you letters and photos of beautiful Ritché brides. Here brides choose from exciting Ritché Original Designs in fine fabrics and laces from around the world, and from the best selection of Canadian and international designers. From simple to elaborate, traditional to contemporary, Ritché has a style to suit each bride's needs and every wedding theme.

Relax in private consultation rooms while you select confidently with the assistance of the friendly and knowledgeable consultants.

The main floor features an incredible selection of ready-to-wear outfits in addition to hundreds of reorderable dresses and suits. The incredible selection allows each woman to create her own unique and exciting fashion statement. Fashion consultants assist with the selection and expert fittings. Skilled dressmakers make sure the fit is just right.

Bridal Experts for over 40 years

No wedding is complete without the bridal party. At Ritché, bridesmaids can choose from hundreds of the latest reorderable styles. However, as important as they may be, no one matches the excitement of a beaming flower girl!

Ritché is always striving for new and exciting items. For instance, the store's lower level has added a large display of bridal guest books, picture frames and other beautiful accessories. They even have a colouring book designed for matching attendants! All these items have been popular for shower and engagement gifts. To top it off, the store has

Barak considers unity role

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Labor party leader Ehud Barak said last week that he would consider joining a national unity government, but only if Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu changed his policies.

A national unity government could provide a much-needed consensus to restart the negotiations with the Palestinians that have been suspended since March.

Speaking after meeting with Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, who initiated the idea, Barak said that he would only consider joining a national unity government if the current government made a "180-degree turn" from its present policies regarding the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

There will be something to discuss "when the prime minister reaches the conclusion that his policy of the last 16 months is leading Israel on the slope to an unnecessary war," said Barak.

His comments marked a slight shift from his previous opposition to a unity government.

Since replacing former Prime Minister Shimon Peres at the helm of the Labor party in June, the former army chief of staff had dismissed the idea, calling the policies of the governing coalition a "failure."

Several months ago, Netanyahu raised the idea of a national unity government as part of a call for accelerated final-status talks with the Palestinians.

But he was far cooler to the idea, when he told reporters accompanying him on a trip to Austria that he would consider a unity government only when Labor shows a willingness to put "national interest first and foremost."

Latvia: no evidence against Kalejs

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Latvia has found no evidence to support allegations against a suspected Nazi war criminal now living in Australia.

Konrad Kalejs, 84, is alleged to have been a member of the mobile killing squad known as the Arajs Kommando, or Latvian Auxiliary Security Police, that collaborated with the Nazi SS during World War II.

Kalejs is accused of having participated in the killing of 20,000 Jews in Latvia during World War II.

He claims that he was a university student at the time.

About 75,000 Jews, or more than 90 percent of the country's prewar Jewish community, were murdered during the war by the Nazis — with help from local residents.

The Latvian Prosecutor General's Office said recently that the investigation into Kalejs' past included an examination of records and testimony originally gathered during the 1950s and 1960s by Soviet KGB officials who had investigated Kalejs and other alleged Nazi collaborators.

The office said that its investigation indicated that "several Latvians had participated in the persecution of Jews during World War II," but that it had no convincing evidence about Kalejs.

Several dozen Latvians were tried in this former Soviet republic after World War II for collaborating with the Nazis.

But some of them were pardoned as "victims of the KGB" after Latvia gained its independence from the Soviet Union in 1991.

The Latvian foreign ministry said that it will forward the findings later this month to the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre, which recently called for the deportation of Kalejs from Australia to Latvia to face charges.

Kalejs moved to Australia after the war and later relocated to the United States. He is alleged to have used his position in the Australian immigration department, where he worked in the 1950s, to help fellow Arajs Kommando squad members settle there.

Kalejs was ordered deported from the United States to Australia in 1994. He subsequently fled to Canada, where he lived for three years. He was deported by Canada to Australia in August.

Within days after he arrived in Australia, officials said it was unlikely he would be prosecuted under Australian war crimes legislation.

Czech Jews Angered

PRAGUE — The recent revelation that a wanted Nazi war criminal is living comfortably in a Munich nursing home has evoked protests from Czech Jewish leaders, one of whom has accused German authorities of having little interest in bringing such criminals to justice.

Jewish leaders have joined Czech politicians in calling on the German government to prosecute Anton Malloth, 85, who served as a prison guard at the Theresienstadt ghetto in Czechoslovakia during the war.

More than 33,000 Jews died in the ghetto, and many thousands more were sent to their deaths in concentration camps to the east.

OSI In Action

NEW YORK — The U.S. Department of Justice has moved to revoke the citizenship of a Pennsylvania man who allegedly served as a guard at two SS-run labor camps and helped liquidate the Warsaw Ghetto.

According to a complaint filed last week, Fedir Kwoczak, 76, participated in Operation Reinhard, a Nazi program that orchestrated the murders of nearly two million Polish Jews, the complaint said.

Kwoczak was allegedly stationed at Trawniki and Poniatowa, SS camps where thousands of Jews were incarcerated and later murdered.

In April 1943, Kwoczak allegedly was among a battalion of guards who liquidated the Warsaw Ghetto. By mid-May, 50,000 Jews had been shot or sent to Treblinka, Majdanek and other forced labor camps.

CAJE Appointment

NEW YORK — Mark Charendoff of New York City was recently elected member-at-large of the Board of the Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education (CAJE).

Charendoff has served as the director of Judaic Cultura! Development at Toronto's JCC and served as co-program chair for a mini-CAJE conference in Toronto.

Meili to be Honored

NEW YORK — Chistoph Meili, the Swiss bank guard who prevented the shredding of crucial "Nazi Gold" Holocaust documents, will be honored next month in New York City by the Boys Town Jerusalem Foundation.

JNF Cutbacks

NEW YORK — The Jewish National Fund of America has approved plans to cut $5.1 million from its budget and has pledged to send 70 percent of the money it raises annually to Israel by the year 2001.

The planned cuts involve closing five regional offices and eliminating 32 full-time posts.

The administrative committee of the Zionist philanthropy – known best for planting trees in Israel – approved the initiatives last week.

New Shul in Lithuania

MOSCOW — A new synagogue has been dedicated in the Lithuanian city of Klaipeda.

The synagogue includes a small soup kitchen to offer meals to needy Jews twice a week. The community has received a Torah scroll from a British synagogue.

The Lithuanian seaport, formerly known as Memel, had a Jewish community before the war of 10,000 that was totally destroyed during the Holocaust.

The town is now home to about 300 Jews who have long awaited the opening of a synagogue, according to the community leader Boris Smoliaras.

No Time Off

NEW YORK — A battle over freedom of religion is brewing in southern Florida, where at least four Jewish post office employees have been denied time off for the High Holidays.

Now the employees of the U.S. Postal Service in Coral Springs, Fla., are struggling to figure out how they will observe Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

It's like "something out of history books you read about," said Sid Gradman, a postal carrier and 10-year employee of the office.

The problem stems from a postal regulation, which states that no more than six people can take a day off at the same time.

Of the nearly 100 people in the office, at least eight are Jewish.

Holocaust Memorial Dedicated

WYSZKOW, Poland — It was an ordinary town where ordinary Jewish life was all but destroyed.

And what was lost was reflected in the tears of the former Jewish residents who came from far away last week to witness the dedication of a Holocaust memorial here.

The memorial in this small town near Warsaw commemorates the thousands of local Jews who were deported to their deaths by the Nazis in 1943.

The ceremony was also a rededication of the Jewish cemetery, which the Nazis had destroyed in 1939 by uprooting the tombstones and using them for paving materials and for the construction of the local Gestapo headquarters.

Scores of the desecrated tombstones were recovered and used for the creation of the monument.

Dozens of Jewish survivors from Wyszkow and Jews who traced their ancestry to Wyszkow attended the dedication cere-

The (high) cost of keeping kosher

One of the important amenities that signals a Jewish community's coming of age is a strong, central body to regulate kashrut. Toronto is one such city where the Kashruth Council of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, popularly known as COR, serves that function.

It was not always that way. In fact, so rancorous has the subject been over the years that at one time or another various sectors of the community did not talk to each other, or avoided eating food supervised by the "other" party, or insisted on eating only salads at an institution or function whose kashrut was certified by the "other" side.

Kashrut in Toronto

Acceptance within the community of COR supervision is almost universal. However, there are still disagreements from time to time about the decisions that COR makes. Not every one is satisfied with the status quo.

In the final installment of our three-part series, CJN staff reporter Leila Speisman examines some of the issues and disatisfactions that have arisen recently in the community regarding that status quo.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – The first and indeed the main issue that surfaces when people think about kashrut is its high cost. Eventually all concerns that are raised regarding kashrut supervision in the Greater Toronto area relate back to or somehow affect cost.

Meat and Poultry

A recent trip to a local grocery store showed the price of kosher hot dogs to be $3.49 as opposed to $1.49 for non-kosher hot dogs. Kosher medium fat ground beef was being sold for $3.56 per pound as opposed to non-kosher lean ground beef at $1.88.

There was also a price differential between kosher as opposed to non-kosher chicken parts however the difference was less dramatic, on average 10 to 30 cents.

Price differentials can be sufficiently dramatic to make a sizable impact in the family budget: $3.99 per pound for a (non-kosher) short rib blade roast, as opposed to close to $ 9.00 per pound for a comparable kosher roast.

To some extent, the laws of supply and demand play a key role in determining the prices of kosher foods. Because the demand for non-kosher meat is far greater than the demand for kosher meat,the supply is also far greater. The stores selling it therefore, can offer better prices.

Supply, demand plays key role

By and large, however, the difference in the meat and poultry prices relate directly to the additional steps that observation of kashrut entails. Kosher shchitah is a more expensive process than non-kosher slaughter, with its meticulous attention to methods, the acceptability for eating of far fewer pieces of meat or poultry, and the fact that only the front half of a cow can be consumed. That is not to say that the back half is considered waste; it is simply sold to non-kosher butchers.

According to some spokespeople who wished to remain anonymous, the lack of competition in the area of kosher slaughter naturally drives the prices of kosher meat products higher. They question why in a community and a market the size of greater Toronto, more slaughterhouses have not opened, or been allowed to.

In Toronto, there is only one kosher slaughter house, Dominion Meat Packers. Kosher meat is also available through Lazar Yitzchok, a local meat supplier, which imports meat from Agri Meat Processors in Iowa.

Poultry is available from Chai Poultry in Toronto, and Marvid in Montreal.

Grocery items

Kosher grocery items, on the other hand, are not generally more expensive than non-kosher brands. A spokesperson from the Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations, whose O-U hechsher is one of the most ubiquitous and respected, noted that food manufacturing companies consider kosher supervision a marketing device, a means of attracting more customers, and feel that whatever costs there are, are evened out by the public relations effect.

UJA FEDERATION

Maya and Vladimir Kogan had a dream - to come to Canada with their two children and build a better life. Thanks to Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, their dream came true.

SEARCHING FOR ROOTS

Jewish life was non-existent in their Russian hometown of Astrakhan, just outside Moscow. There was no synagogue and no Jewish community centre. The Kogans barely managed meagre celebrations of some Jewish holidays in the privacy of their modest home. "We did the little we could to bring the holidays to our children," explains Maya, a medical doctor by training who now practices physiotherapy. "We longed to do more and know more about our customs and traditions."

In search of a more Jewish life, the Kogans eventually applied to several countries for landed immigrant status. Canada was the first to respond thanks to a letter sent by JIAS on behalf of the Kogans, who had contacted distant cousins living in Toronto. JIAS guaranteed financial support for the couple until they found employment, which Maya says, "made all the difference" when they arrived in Toronto in May 1994. "We couldn't have done this on our own," notes Vladimir.

A NEW BEGINNING

Maya, Vladimir, and their children Anna, 8, and Semen, 4, immediately enrolled in English courses conducted by JIAS and began to attend classes to learn more about their Jewish heritage.

Several months ago, JIAS helped Maya's parents come to Canada to see their grandchildren. Vladimir's parents will arrive to complete the family within the next year. "Both Maya and I are the only children in our families," explains Vladimir. "It means so much to have the whole family together."

For 75 years, JIAS, with UJA Federation's help, has been bringing families like the Kogans to Canada to fulfill their dreams. It's another example of UJA Federation Funding in Action.

A unity tornado

Like a tornado that arrives unexpectedly and leaves ruin and disbelief, the unity proposal unveiled last week in Calgary by the nine premiers outside Quebec and the two territorial leaders blew across Canadian skies and left the separatists' landscape damaged and dishevelled.

Essentially, the Calgary plan is more symbolic than substantive. But the symbols were good. The premiers were attempting to demonstrate to the people of Quebec their bona fide desire to find a reasonable, mutually beneficial and legally meaningful resolution to the unity crisis.

Underpinning the plan is the laudable attempt to emotionally, psychologically and legally fuse two elementary principles of Canadian life: equality of all Canadians and the unique character of Quebec society.

It was an assertive, though very careful step toward weaving a new federal fabric. It expresses the important sentiment especially among western Canadians, articulated in the last federal election often inappropriately, by Preston Manning, that some statement of equality must be enshrined in a new national vision.

It also expresses the equally important sentiment that Quebec society is distinct, without however, having to actually use the precise words.

The plan was impressive for two reasons. The first is that it was signed at all, and unanimously so. It provides a common platform among all the premiers of Canada on which to build a campaign for national survival.

The second is that it contains within it, the possibility of creative application. It is an open process and envisions refinement and yet further refinement. It is therefore, just the beginning.

The separatists appear to have underestimated the premiers' ability to achieve consensus. Once the reviving breeze blew in from the west, separatists lost their hats.

Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard was clearly rattled. Preferring not to comment on the good faith of his premier colleagues, he denounced the Calgary proposal in the strongest of terms.

"What will it give us, what will it change? Nothing," he asked reporters. But because he had no rebuttal on the merits of the proposal, he resorted to his favorite tactic: name-calling. Invective dripping heavily from his tongue, he attacked Daniel Johnson personally "What a pitiful spectacle," he said. "It is the first time that a Quebec leader of the Opposition goes begging to the rest of Canada for support for his party."

Bouchard's behavior was only the first act of a three-act separatist denouement last week.

On Wednesday, the government of Quebec cobbled together a press conference at which they announced their intention to bring forth a coalition of diverse Quebecers to denounce the concept of partition.

One of the leaders of the anti-partition coalition is union leader Gerald Larose.

Larose was quoted in the Globe and Mail as offering the following justification for the coalition's cause: "From what I know, there are people from all walks of life who find the partitionist idea to be racist, a reproduction of Serb strategy in Canada and Quebec. We have to set the record straight. Regardless of one's political option, it must be assured that Quebec's integrity will be protected." (Our emphasis)

In what conceivable way could a partitionist be considered to be racist? For what conceivable purpose would Larose have used the term?

In the two referenda that have already been held, the last one on an abstruse and confusing question, more than half of the people of Quebec have said they want the "integrity" of Canada to be protected. More than 40 municipalities in Quebec have passed resolutions to the same effect.

Why is the integrity of Quebec sacrosanct but not equally so the integrity of Canada? And if the integrity of either is encroachable, should it not be done according to the rule of law?

Recent polls have indicated that a majority of Quebecers understand and accept the logic of the partitionists argument.

On Thursday, we witnessed Act 3, a bizarre spectacle, probably unprecedented in any western democracy, conceived by and starring Gilles Duceppe, leader of the Bloc Québécois.

He led a coterie of fellow Bloc MPs on a march to the steps of the Supreme Court of Canada where they denounced the court for agreeing to hear the reference on the legality of a unilateral declaration by Quebec of independence.

The Bloc's justice critic Michel Bellehumeur tried to justify his colleague's odious behavior. According to the Globe and Mail, Bellehumeur said the Bloc was asking the court to resist the "pseudo-primacy of law" for political and anti-democratic purposes.

"It is no way a question here of the primacy of law. The only primacy is that of democracy, the primacy of the vote, the primacy of the people. In this whole debate, beyond tactics, strategies of fear and the manoeuvres of the federal government, it is the Quebec people alone that will have the last word." (Our emphasis)

The absurdity of their action almost defies description. In all true democracies the separation of the executive, legislative and judicial branches of government is not only vital, but is indeed cherished. Imagine, if one can, members of the legislative branch publicly demonstrating against the members of the judiciary, trying to berate, bully and browbeat them?

What conclusions are we to draw from the Bloc's behavior about their respect for the rule of law or about their understanding of the raw essentials of a properly functioning democracy?

They seem not to understand the single most important rudiment of our way of life: the law is not merely incidental to democracy. It is its sustaining force. Without law there is neither democracy nor is there freedom. Without law, the vote of the majority quickly evolves into a rule of tyranny and a society of anarchy.

We are confident that the vast majority of the people of Quebec understand this; they will not be fooled by the guile or the desperation of the separatists. MBD

Transnistria remembered

TORONTO — Survivors of the Holocaust in Transnistria are invited to attend the annual commemoration service of the Transnistria Survivors' Association on Sept. 28 at 2 p.m. at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

An estimated 325,000 Jews died in Transnistria, an artificially created territory established by the pro-Nazi wartime government of Romania.

The service will mark 56 years since the Romanian and German governments began to deport Jews from the Romanian regions of Bucovina, Bessarabia and Dorhoi, to an area between the Bug and Dniester rivers in present-day Ukraine. Jews sent to the area perished in concentration and labor camps.

The Transnistria Survivors' Association was founded in 1994. For information on the service, call 416-638-1291.

New signs at the City of David Messianic Synagogue: Community leaders still want the congregation out of the Thornhill plaza. [Ron Csillag photo]

Controversial signs removed at messianic 'synagogue'

But community leaders pledge fight isn't over

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Community officials are hailing as "a major victory" last week's decision to remove a large sign and change another for the City of David Messianic Synagogue in Thornhill.

But Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) says the fight isn't over.

And Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group, has plans to take over a small storefront right next door to City of David.

Following lengthy discussions between the congregation and Aetna Canada, the owner of the plaza in which it is situated, Aetna last Thursday night tore down a large sign proclaiming "City of David Messianic Synagogue," including the Hebrew words Ir David (city of David), and replaced it with one reading "The Main Exchange" (the plaza's name).

A smaller sign over the congregation's entrance, recessed into the plaza itself, has been changed from "City of David Messianic Synagogue" to simply, "City of David."

Aetna took the action after talks with the congregation's lawyer, who was supplied by the American Centre for Law and Justice, a U.S. civil rights group.

The meeting was "unable to come to any agreement," Aetna vice-president for corporate services Pat Smith told The CJN.

Smith said Aetna has received threats of violence against the plaza and against certain individuals, as well as numerous letters and phone calls of complaint. She said some businesses in the plaza were losing money.

The company took down and changed the signs "to ensure the safety of tenants and visitors and prevent further loss [of revenue] and harm to the businesses," Smith said.

Smith did not say whether this spells an end to the matter. "We have not made any further decisions. We'll continue to investigate," she said.

But she did confirm that Aetna is negotiating with Jews for Judaism, which has its eye on the Not Just Yogurt shop next door to City of David.

Smith said Not Just Yogurt, which is under the supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, has surrendered its lease.

The latest measure defuses a heated, month-long battle between Jewish communal officials, the congregation and Aetna. CJC, Jews for Judaism and other groups demanded, at a minimum, that the signs state the congregation is a church.

At the most, Congress and Jews for Judaism, wanted – and still want – City of David to leave the plaza.

In a letter to Smith, 11 rabbis and community leaders say the "only satisfactory, permanent solution remains the removal" of the congregation from the plaza.

In the meantime, the change of signs "is a major victory," said Moshe Ronen, CJC Ontario region chair. "The anxiety we felt about Jews being misled has been resolved, within reason."

However, Aetna "still has an obligation to remove this tenant, and we're encouraging them to do so."

Ronen said he was told by Aetna that removing and changing the signs was an interim measure.

"But if this [change of signs] is all they can accomplish, we can live with the situation."

Ronen said there will be no further communal pressure brought to bear on the owner. Members of the public, civic officials and rabbis had been holding regular and boisterous protests outside the congregation, charging that City of David, whose members believe Jews should accept Jesus as their messiah, is a church masquerading as a synagogue that threatens to lure vulnerable Jews to Christianity.

Congress and other groups said City of David chose its location, at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue, in a deliberate attempt to reach out to Jews.

Moving right next door to the congregation would be "a major coup for us," said Julius Ciss, executive director of Jews for Judaism.

He said the branch office would operate as a counselling, information and resource centre.

"It would be impossible for people to see that there is no Jewish presence there," Ciss said. "We've never had the opportunity to be so close to a Hebrew-Christian missionary group before."

Ciss said that ultimately, Jews for Judaism wants City of David out of the plaza.

A distraught sounding Jeffrey Forman, City of David's spiritual leader, told The CJN that his lawyer will explore legal options against the plaza owner.

The removal and changing of the signs "was a unilateral move and against our permission," he said. "Any other tenant would feel the same way."

Forman said the whole matter "has mushroomed into the arena of serious religious discrimination and persecution. It shows that sin in the heart of a Jew is the same as sin in the heart of a gentile."

He said he has no plans to quit the plaza.

Dealing with a child's loss at High Holy Days

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "If you don't want to observe the holidays, then don't. There's no reason to feel guilty. You need not listen to anyone but yourself."

Murray Scheinert doesn't mean to sound selfish. It's just that when one's child dies, as Scheinert's son Stephen did almost three years ago, the grieving process takes precedence over everything, washing over pain-wracked parents like a dark, numbing wave.

With the High Holy Days just weeks away, parents whose children have died will again be faced with a particularly stressful, depressing time. Judaism, after all, places a lot of emphasis on the centrality and wholeness of the family, and for grieving parents, the Yom Tovim, when families come together, can become an awful chore.

Gail Agasi, whose daughter Orly Watkin died of meningitis in 1994, bluntly says she "hates" the new year.

"There's no new beginning for me," she says sadly. "What right do I have to be healed?" At this time of year, "You have to do what's right for yourself."

And Ned Levitt will never forget the first Rosh Hashanah after his 18-year-old daughter Stacey was killed by a car that hit her while she was out jogging. It was just 23 days after she was buried, and "I cannot describe the pain of that evening and that dinner."

But the pain felt by parents who lose a child, Levitt rationalizes, could be a gift that transports them to a level of religious experience they would not otherwise attain.

Scheinert, Agasi and Levitt appeared together on an emotionally-charged panel last week for Bereaved Jewish Families of Ontario to discuss how grieving parents can handle the coming holidays.

The consensus seemed to be that parents should do what their hearts tell them.

Jewish custom may tell us when mourning ends, but "there is no time in which we must end our grieving," said Scheinert, whose 36-year-old son was killed in a highrise fire. "The loss of any family member is traumatic, but the loss of a child is traumatic to parents in the extreme."

There's almost a desire among affected parents not to observe holidays at all, Scheinert told the small audience at Adath Israel Congregation. In the end, parents "must follow their instincts and do whatever you feel is necessary for you."

Agasi said she's reluctant to allow herself to heal and renew because she feels that would diminish the impact of her daughter's death.

Orly Watkin died at age 15. "and one month before her birthday and one month before the date of her death, I start slipping. But on the dates of her birth and death, I feel nothing."

These days, Agasi finds herself going longer and longer without thinking of Orly. "There are even times when I'm okay. So I'm healing even if I don't want to."

The holidays are especially hard because "I'll never be who I once was. I can't be. I don't even want to be. Something is missing that can't be replaced."

Despite advice from others to "get on" with her life, "I'm allowing myself to grieve and to forgive others who say stupid things to me."

Looking back on that first Rosh Hashanah after his daughter's death, Levitt said that on reflection, "I have never before had such a burning desire to be at that table with my family. I never felt as close to God as I did that night.

"I am so very proud of my family for how we got through that dinner. With courage and enormous dedication to our Jewish roots, and to the memory of Stacey, we completed the home service."

That night, Levitt said, set the stage for how to deal with his grief. "If my family could get through that first Rosh Hashanah, we could get through anything. I learned that night that you can't get around the grief, you can't get under it or over it. You just have to get through it and get to the other side. And on the other side, there is a life worth living."

Bereaved Jewish Families of Ontario, said president Paul Goldstein, was founded seven years ago as an outgrowth of Jewish Family & Child Service. The group runs self-help support groups and sponsors occasional family nights around Jewish holidays to help grieving parents and siblings cope with the loss of a child.

Baycrest expansion set to begin soon

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Construction is expected to start in two months on the new building that will replace Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's Jewish Home for the Aged. Residents should be able to move in during 1999.

The ground-breaking ceremony preceded by one day, the formal end of the campaign to raise $60 million. "We reached our target," said a Baycrest official.

The new complex will contain two major facilities, the 372-bed Apotex Centre Jewish Home for the Aged and the 100-bed Centre for Cognitive Disorders which will care for elderly people with Alzheimer disease and other disorders.

The new building will be joined to the Baycrest Hospital.

At the ground-breaking, Premier Mike Harris announced that the province is giving $18.9 million to the project, estimated to cost $50 to $60 million.

The Baycrest project, Harris said, is an example of what can be achieved when government and the community work together.

About 200 guests attended the ceremony, including Barry Sherman, chair of Apotex, a North York drug company that donated $6 million.

Officials said $31 million of the $60 million raised will go to the new building.

Sally Fisher, 88, a four-year resident at Baycrest and chair of its residents' council, told Harris that both the nursing and support staff are wonderful. She presented Harris with a blanket crocheted by resident Chana Fish.

Harris joked that when he decides to retire, the new home might just be prepared "to accept a gentile from North Bay."

Each floor of the seven-storey building will have six home units for 13 or 14 residents. Every resident will have a private room and washroom.

There also will be three kitchenettes on each floor as well as large activity rooms and a "kinder room," where visiting children can play.

Other features include a seven-storey atrium with gardens and an outside picnic garden.

Your generosity set the perfect tone.

Last week, starting with Super Sunday, September 14, over 7500 people contributed more than $2 million toward Jews in need. The poor, the sick, the elderly, newcomers, educators, students and Jews in danger anywhere in the world can rely on our community to remember them. We have a long distance to go before achieving our goal. But we will. Because what we have in common counts for more than what sets us apart.

Signs of fatigue

Recent reports out of Israel describe a country whose people are demoralized and discouraged, at a loss to find even little sparks of optimism from which to light larger flames of national purpose and resolve.

Chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak referred to the national psyche as one in which there are abundant "signs of fatigue." He was speaking in the aftermath of the failed raid into south Lebanon by elite navy commandos in which 11 soldiers died and one disappeared, presumed now to be dead. That raid came only two weeks after a terrible mishap, also in south Lebanon, in which four IDF soldiers died of burns and of smoke inhalation.

Shortly after that incident, two more soldiers died, when the transport in which they were travelling in north Israel, overturned on the crest of a hill.

The vast majority of the soldiers whose names appear on obituaries are barely beyond teenagehood, mere youngsters whose lives ended far too early and whose contributions to the world were still ahead of them.

But the growing number of casualties in south Lebanon is not the only cause of the fatigue.There is also the terrorism that lurks potentially on every street and in every crowd such as at Machane Yehuda or on Ben Yehuda Street.

And then there was the famous kiss, that high profile public embrace by Yasser Arafat of the leaders of Islamic Jihad, Hamas and Hezbollah. Virtually every Israeli now doubts Arafat.

Is it any wonder then that the people are grim and fatigued?

Yet, despite the grimness of the mood and the fatigue of the soul, Israelis are not willing to give up on the possibility of peace. A public opinion poll published two weeks ago in Ma'ariv showed that 57 percent of the Jewish public still want Israel to pursue "Oslo." As the newspaper also pointed out, if one extrapolates that result to include the non-Jewish public, it would mean that more than 66 percent of Israelis still support the Oslo process.

This is quite remarkable. Israelis still want to push on, exhausting every possible path to peace until there are none left to walk.

As much as Jews in the Diaspora empathize with and care for and "suffer with" the people of Israel, we cannot assuage their heavy mood or relieve their sense of fatigue. Therefore, we must be ever careful not to add to their burdens.

It is in this light that we condemn the actions of Irwin Moscowitz, the owner of the house in Ras al Amud into which three Jewish families moved during the visit by Madeleine Albright to the region.We are not commenting on the right of Jews to live in all parts of Jerusalem. Jerusalem must never be closed to Jews, although here the issue is more complicated, having regard to neighborhoods and religious sensibilities. Rather, we are commenting on the propriety of Moscowitz's behavior. We are commenting on the spectacle of an American effectively saying to the government of Israel, "I will establish policy; not you," forcing his personal and nationalist views upon the prime minister and government of Israel. For almost a week, the millionaire negotiated with the prime minister as if in a market, without any regard to the embarrassment or the deference due to the elected government of the state of Israel. It was an unseemly sight.

Regardless of the party or the person governing Israel, regardless of the policies one either supports or opposes, this sanctimonious, self-righteous, "I-know-best" intervention in the political affairs of Israel by Diaspora Jews is wrong.

It only benefits the adversaries of Israel and adds to Israel's grimness of mood and fatigue of the soul.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"This is the history of Israel at the end of the 19th century. To sum it up: The majority of the Jews are a race of accursed beggars...the Jew is condemned to the most extreme pauperism; he is not allowed to use his powers freely."

The Dybbuk caused her torment

I read with great interest and incredulity Sheldon Kirshner's review of The Dybbuk, recently performed during the Ashkenaz festival. (CJN, Sept. 11)

I have had the privilege of seeing The Dybbuk on film and was proud to see such a great Yiddish play. I looked forward to taking my daughter and niece to see this marvellous Yiddish classic at the festival.

Instead, what I saw was an incomprehensible mishmash and distortion of a heart-wrenching love story. Nobody around us was able to understand what the play was about.

Kirshner referred to the play as "being full of sound and fury, signifying torment." As far as I'm concerned, the only torment came from the audience watching this disastrous performance.

Perhaps when the next Ashkenaz festival comes along, there will be more care taken with the presentation of our rich Jewish heritage, so as not to embarrass the audience.

Paper not valid in mezuzot

It is important that the community be aware of the fact that there are Judaica gift shops – and we emphasize gift shops, not book stores — which are either selling or placing in their mezuzot paper instead of parchment. This is totally unacceptable and renders the mezuzah null and void.

The reputable Judaica book stores in Toronto all sell kosher mezuzah parchments inspected by rabbis.

If you have any doubts as to your mezuzah or any questions related to this issue or any other religious issues, call 416-787-1631 or 416-229-2600.

We wish the entire Jewish community of Toronto a most healthy and happy and prosperous New Year and may we all pray for peace and harmony in Israel.

Yad Sarah aids Israeli home care

There was an interesting and useful article (CJN, Sept. 11) outlining roles of various Canadian Friends of Israeli organizations. Unfortunately there was no mention of the Canadian Friends of Yad Sarah.

Yad Sarah, Israel's largest voluntary organization, is financed entirely by contributions. One in three Israeli families has been helped by Yad Sarah with medical and rehabilitative equipment, guidance and services which facilitate home care. Yad Sarah's 6,000 dedicated volunteers operate nearly 80 branches throughout Israel. By reducing or eliminating hospital stays, Yad Sarah saves the Israeli economy about $3.50 million a year. This valuable contribution was rewarded in 1994 when Yad Sarah was awarded the Israel Prize.

Yad Sarah will soon move all its Jerusalem facilities into the new Yad Sarah House being built on Herzl Boulevard.

Israel is alive and well

Martin Himel states (CJN, Sept. 11) that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "wants us to stop dreaming and accept mutual hatred and bloodshed." He then states: "No one is investing, people are down, uninspired, the government is killing the spirit of this nation."

I adamantly disagree with Himel, who, I submit, is allowing his politically-tinted, labor-rose-colored glasses to blind him. Netanyahu does dream of peace, a peace with Palestinians and all Arabs who will be sincere in action and who will be committed and responsible in stopping wholesale murder of civilians (of Israelis and other nations) and who will punish justly those who try to prevent peace.

The prime minister is a dreamer, a realistic dreamer, who believes strongly that dreams must not be unattainable delusions, such as those of some of our previous leaders and governments.

Israel is thriving and will continue to grow from strength to strength.

Himel's dream needs re-awakening; Theodor Herzl's dream is alive and well and living in Israel.

Searching for Harry Walker (Volkovishki)

I am searching for Harry Walker, formerly Volkovishki, from Montreal, or his descendants. My father was Naftali Volkovishki, son of David, of Volkovisk, Lithuania. My father had three brothers who left Volkovisk for Montreal around 1920, where they established a hat factory and changed the family name to Walker. Shortly after the war, in 1945, Walker located my sister and me in Switzerland, and we maintained contact for a period of time after we immigrated to Israel.

Perspectives

An author for all seasons

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD

Shalom Aleichem wrote stories for all the seasons of Jewish life. He brought Yiddish to great literary heights while creating his stories for the common people and the ordinary mentsh. In translation, he also reached a worldwide audience.

With the High Holy Days close at hand, it is worth noting that among Shalom Aleichem's classic tales are A Yom Kippur Scandal, The Day Before Yom Kippur and The Miracle of Hoshana Raba.

He was born Shalom Rabinowitz in Perayaslev, Ukraine, March 2, 1859, in a house that is now a museum devoted to him. He was the son of a talmudic scholar, a devotee of the chassidic Rabbi of Talma, but at the same time a maskil — a follower of the Enlightenment in regard to scientific and secular studies.

From a very young age, he demonstrated great scholarly ability, a strong imagination and a special talent for mimicking the mannerisms of people, all of which stood him in good stead as he developed his writing talent, first in Hebrew and then in Yiddish.

Shalom Aleichem had a cheder education and a traditional bar mitzvah, celebrated in grand style. In his youth, however, he had a tough time. His father became financially ruined; his mother died in a cholera epidemic just after his bar mitzvah; and he was burdened with a difficult step-mother. From his step-mother's vocabulary he developed a lexicon of curses, said to have been one of his earliest literary efforts.

Nevertheless, he obtained a higher education in Russian schools and in 1880, he was elected as crown rabbi for the town of Louben. The crown rabbi was obliged to satisfy the requirements of the government for registration and other regulations affecting the Jews. He functioned alongside the recognized rabbi of the community. Shalom Aleichem held this position for 2½ years. During that period, his first articles were published in the Hebrew journal Hamelitz.

Earlier, Shalom Aleichem had been the tutor of Olga, the 14-year-old daughter of Elimelech Loyav, a wealthy Jew in suburban Kiev. Tutor and student had fallen in love, but her parents did not approve of the marriage. In 1883, however, they were married and Shalom Aleichem resigned as crown rabbi at the request of his father-in-law, who undertook to support him. But this brought only a temporary end to the financial problems that beset him throughout his life.

Within a year of his marriage, he began to write and was published in Yiddish. He proved to be a prolific and prodigious author of exceptional talent.

When he died in New York on May 13, 1916, at age 57, the Yiddish newspapers published black-bordered "extras" proclaiming in huge type: "Shalom Aleichem Dead."

His funeral was attended by an estimated 100,000 to 200,000 people. The funeral service was conducted by Rabbi Dr. Judah L. Magnes, who later became the first president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The next day, the New York Times published Shalom Aleichem's will, calling it "one of the great ethical wills in history."

He asked not be laid to rest "among the aristocrats, the elite, the rich, but rather among the plain people, the toilers, the common folk," so that his tombstone would "grace the simple graves about me, and the simple graves will adorn my tombstone, even as the plain people have, during my life, beatified their folk writer."

He also asked that his son and his sons-in-law "should say Kaddish for me. But if they are not so inclined, or this be against their religious convictions, they may be absolved therefrom only if they all foregather with my daughters and grandchildren, and with good friends, and read my will, and also select one of my stories, of the very merry ones, and recite it in whatever language is more intelligible to them, and let my name be recalled with laughter." He asked that this be done not only at his burial, but also throughout the first year of mourning and at his annual yahrzeit.

While he often argued with God in his writing, he did so as a humanist speaking for his people, as a questioning skeptic, but not necessarily as a non-believer.

Shalom Aleichem captured the imagination of the Jewish people and was one of those rare storytellers whose work summed up the outlook of a whole culture. His literary works have sustained the Jewish people of every variety of religious belief, as well as those with a secular view of Jewish life.

He also founded the Yiddishe Folks Bibliotek, a literary anthology of which he was the publisher and editor, and he persuaded established Hebrew writers to write in Yiddish. He published Mendele Mocher Sforim and I.L.Peretz, who, along with him, came to be considered the three great classic Yiddish writers.

In fact, it was Shalom Aleichem who first called Sforim the zayde of Yiddish literature. And in 1888, he paid Peretz the immense sum of 300 rubles for his poem Monish! Hebrew devotees thought there was a crazy millionaire in Kiev offering unheard of prices to persuade Hebrew writers to turn to Yiddish.

Shalom Aleichem published two editions of about 350 pages each of the Folks Bibliotek, which cost him considerable time and effort as well as money. He had a third edition ready, but his funds ran out.

He also dared to criticize other Yiddish writers. In 1888, he published a short book attacking a writer of Yiddish pulp fiction, Nachum Meyer Shaikevitsch, whose pen-name was Shomer. He accused Shomer of debasing the language and defiling the minds of his readers.

The appearance of the Folks Bibliotek provoked a debate on the language question in the pages of the Hebrew journal Hamelitz and elsewhere and Shalom Aleichem was drawn into it. Hebrew writers who "went over" to Yiddish were called traitors and were accused of writing in Yiddish only because of the substantial fees paid them by Shalom Aleichem, who, in turn, was accused of abandoning Hebrew.

But Shalom Aleichem retained a deep affection for both Yiddish and Hebrew throughout his life. In an article in Hamelitz (1889), he wrote: "The success of Yiddish attests to our writing not for a handful of elite individuals but for an entire people. The people understands us. Our ideas and opinions penetrate the hearts of our brothers. What more need we ask?"

He knew he was being didactic, but in his many wonderful stories, novels and plays, he taught without ever being pedantic and the Jewish people came to accept him as a moral authority.

An example of Shalom Aleichem's social ideology can be seen in his story If I Were Rothschild. The song If I Were a Rich Man, sung by Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof, was adapted from the Rothschild story, but it is a distortion of the writer's intent.

Shalom Aleichem

In the story, a melamed (teacher), not Tevye, talks about Rothschild as he bemoans his lack of money for the Sabbath. The melamed says, "If I were Rothschild, I would be richer than Rothschild because I would do a little teaching on the side." Next, he cites improvements he would make to his house before taking up the plight of the community. Then he asks: "Why only here in Kasrilevke?"

And he fantasizes about world issues: "It's the lack of money which brings envy, envy brings hatred and from hatred comes all the world's troubles: persecutions, killings... and all the wars... ay, the wars, the terrible slaughters.

"If I were Rothschild, I would do away with war altogether; I would wipe it completely off the face of the earth... With no more war, what do we need weapons for, armies and cannons and all the other trappings? The answer is we don't. If there are no more weapons and armies, we'll have no more envy and no more hatred... The face of the earth will be changed."

Fiddler on the Roof did not promote a true understanding of Shalom Aleichem's work. Tevye the dairyman is one of three major characters he created, each of whom has risen to the level of a "Jewish archetype." The other two are Menachem Mendel, the luftmentsh, and Mottel, the cantor's son, who represents Jewish childhood. The latter two are not as well known as Tevye, especially since Fiddler on the Roof helped to stimulate the publication of more English translations than ever before of Shalom Aleichem's writings.

Today the writer can be found in many places. In a recent tentative sortie onto the Internet, I found a Yiddish language and culture home page, still under construction, with the title Welcome to the Virtual Shtetl [http://sunsite.unc.edu/yiddish/sholal.html]. It had a list of 15 works by Shalom Aleichem that were published in Yiddish in special editions by the New York Yiddish daily Morgen-frayheyt in 1937.

Micha Yosef Berdichevsky, a leading Hebrew writer who was a contemporary of Shalom Aleichem and who also appreciated Yiddish, wrote many years ago that without Shalom Aleichem's popular stories, "we would be missing a whole world, a Mishneh Torah of the soul of the common people in their own language and their own spirit."

How should we remember Shalom Aleichem today? The Nazis destroyed the world and the culture of which he was one of the prime recorders, as well as six million of his people. Marie-Waife Goldberg, his daughter, in her biography My Father Sholom Aleichem, recalls meeting ghetto escapees and labor camp survivors who told her how her father's stories, "miraculously retained in captivity... were a source of solace, cheer and courage in their misery."

His family followed his last request for more than 50 years and read one of his stories at his yahrzeit. We, the heirs of his larger family – the Jewish people – may also follow his request and read one of his great stories, not only at his yahrzeit but at every major Jewish holiday. The lesson of Shalom Aleichem's last will may also be applied to our remembrance of the victims of the Holocaust: Kaddish is not enough! Remembering and renewing their culture is also important.

Abraham Arnold is the author of Judaism: Legend, History and Custom, from the Religious to the Secular. He serves as an advisor to the Sholom Aleichem Cultural Group in Winnipeg, a new secular humanist Jewish community organization.

Opinions

Readjusting to life in Canada

Kosher cheese is expensive regardless of where you buy it. Whether Halifax or Jerusalem it doesn't really make a difference – it's outrageously overpriced either way. But from Jerusalem to Halifax, there are a lot of distinctions. I'm still relearning some of the rules.

By Viva Press in Halifax

I have travelled a fair bit over the past couple of years, so it shouldn't really take me a lot of time to readjust back to Canadian life. For some reason, this year has been different.

After spending 3½ months in Israel, I returned to Toronto for 12 days. Normally, this would have been plenty of time for me to get back into the Canadian-mode of living. But, I seem to be stuck in the Israeli mindset.

One of my problems is always thinking in terms of shekels. On my second day back from Israel, I went to a store to buy a can of Sprite. I took out my five dollar bill hoping it would be enough, sometimes stores charge six dollars for one can of pop. When the cashier said 75 cents, I thought I had heard incorrectly. What was wrong with the can I had chosen? Was it dented? On the shelf too long? When the cashier asked if I had a loonie instead of the five dollar bill, I remembered we were talking in Canadian money, not shekels. I was embarrassed that I had hesitated when she initially quoted the price. In Israel, you'd pay up to six shekels for a can of pop, that would be grossly overpriced here.

The cost of things isn't the only thing that can be maddening. Road etiquette is too. From Jerusalem to Toronto, there really isn't that much of a difference. There are still a lot of cars, and the pedestrian or biker doesn't really have the right of way. In Halifax, the opposite is true.

The first car I walked into wasn't parked on the side of the road. It was in the middle of the road. I wasn't drunk either. In fact, I was fully awake and in control of my sense.

I wanted to cross Spring Garden Road, one of Halifax's main streets, to get from my apartment to the drugstore across the road. I watched the cars go by in both directions, and calculated when to step onto the road. My calculations were off target because I had imagined I was in Jerusalem (or Toronto or another busy city). I stepped onto the road and instead of going after the car I had pinpointed, it and the rest of the cars on the road stopped to let me cross. I had planned for the car to pass me. When it stopped in front of me, I walked into it.

And then there are the line-ups. Earlier in the summer, I wrote about the fact that there are no real line-ups in Israel. Now, I'm so used to the Israeli chaos that I can't stop the urge I have to push forward in a line. The other day in a clothing store, I almost butted in front of someone who had two items because I only had one. Fortunately, I stopped myself and remembered that this is Canada, and my turn would come.

I think I may have overcome my state of confusion by a recent visit to an IGA in Halifax, where I bought some kosher mozzarella cheese. The small packet of cheese cost me just over five dollars. There are no qualms about it, I know this is expensive for both here and there.

Life on an emotional coaster

This year, while we have been struggling to get back into the routine that accompanies the new school year, the shocking events that have taken place have made it difficult to settle down into a customary framework.

By Justin Korda in Montreal

We have been saddened by the untimely death of Princess Diana and the sorrowful passing of Mother Teresa, two women whose dedication to different types of charities has inspired millions. Then we were moved by the savage bombings on Ben Yehuda Street, a pedestrian mall that surely anyone who has been to Israel can say they visited. That was followed by a disastrous operation of the Israeli Defence Forces in Southern Lebanon, which took the lives of 12 Israeli boys.

And while all of this bad news has steadily unfolded, Canadians have been up in arms over the crude and heartless words of newly arrived talk show celebrity, Howard Stern. Ironically, though, hardly anyone has actually decided to change the dial, thereby making Stern even more popular and adding fuel to his rhetorical fire.

X-Files nuts and conspiracy theorists have been on a field trip, attempting to come up with paranormal explanations to elucidate this intense wave of negative events in the world. Some have even gone to the extent of seeing in these tragedies an indication that the end of the world is imminent.

Although I admit that this thought may be a tad far-fetched, and I wouldn't start building an ark, I do believe that it provides some food for thought.

Whether the end of the world is actually knocking on our doors or not, one can interpret this wave of bad news as a calling for a desperately needed change. As students, we possess an innate drive to have fun. An underestimation of this drive at this point in time would be a pitiful waste of an opportunity. By pumping some joy into the mainstream we would be capitalizing on an opportunity that could truly benefit the mood of the world today.

From a Jewish perspective, we can learn from a recent Torah portion that joy is an essential quality of life. The sages tell us that even if people are intellectually aware of their surroundings and appreciate the value of life, they must experience this through joy.

> Joy is an essential quality of life

The emotional roller coaster that the world has recently experienced is levelling off as the impact of the tragedies begins to settle in the minds and hearts of people, causing a dreary and sombre mood to take shape throughout society. The down feeling that comes in the aftermath of large-scale tragedies results from people's will to hold on to the memory of that which is gone.

However, the best way to memorialize is to incorporate the essence of the loss into one's life. By proactively embracing a new endeavor inspired by the actions of another person, the memory of that figure surely lives on. When a habitual routine is broken by devastating news, there can be no better way to remember than by translating the impact of the devastation back into our routine.

When tragedy strikes, it is normal for people to react in pain and sorrow. But afterward, when the loss starts to be understood in the context of reality, we should train ourselves to react in such a manner that the world can benefit from the lesson learned. When the impact of a catastrophe is translated into effective activism, the memory of the tragedy is safeguarded, the entire world benefits and the frame of mind of the people affected is lifted. Here we learn that joy and sadness are not opposing feelings. Joy can in fact be achieved as a result of learning from a sad experience.

As a way to remember Princess Di, we can follow the example she was setting and devote ourselves to certain causes and achieve the satisfaction and joy that she surely experienced from her work. Mother Teresa's compassion and lifelong devotion to charity have the power to inspire that same warm attitude among everyday people. From the agony in Israel, we can learn to appreciate the value of our lives and the importance of experiencing our days in joy.

And as for Howard Stern, well no matter how hurt we are by his crudeness, we are still going to keep on listening. So whether it's Howard Stern or anything else, take the time to think about how the world could benefit from the event that is interrupting your routine. For when the world benefits the level of joy rises.

Hopes and concern

In the memory of most readers, there was a time when we, as a community, lurched from one crisis to another. No sooner had the danger of the Six Day War passed, the War of Attrition came upon us, the Baghdad executions chilled us to the bone and the Soviet persecutions became our daily worry.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In time, fortunately, the crises lessened. Eight hundred thousand Russian Jews have since then come to Israel – and many of us forget that it was, in part, because of Jewish generosity throughout the world that this enormous migration could be financed. Rescue was what Jewish life always was about.

But as the tensions lessened, so did many people's involvement and generosity, and while the emotional depth of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination brought us together again, it was short-lived. In addition, anti-Semitism, which was once so central to Diaspora existence, no longer plays a significant role in our lives.

There is another difference between yesterday and today. We had a community in those days, one community – which today is badly splintered. It happens at a time when there are three major challenges to worry about, but the very fact that we have begun to articulate them is also a source of hope. The three challenges are rescue, the alleviation of poverty and the preservation of our identity.

Rescue: Its task is not yet done. Not all the Jews who need to go to Israel have been able to go.

Poverty: It exists underground and away from public gaze – but you must see it, for you must help to alleviate poverty's gravest and destructive consequences.

Identity: We are all worried about our children's and grandchildren's future as Jews. Most people do not know the role that UJA dollars plays on our campuses, where it shores up a sense of identity amongst those who are the most vulnerable amongst us: our college students.

There is a fourth worry and it has to do with the polarization that has beset so many of our communities. It has a political dimension and also – alas! – a religious one. While synagogues are the mainstay of Jewish culture and survival, they have lately all too often also become the carriers of divisiveness. Fortunately, overall efforts like those made by UJA Federation in Toronto have managed to bridge the gap to some degree and it thereby serves as the glue that holds our community together. In its campaign this year, the slogan is One People Forever and its support becomes the duty of all of us. Tzedakah means charity, but it also means obligation.

At the advent of Rosh Hashanah, we should all resolve to help re-establish a sense of unity amongst us. This resolve will serve as the fourth pillar in our communal structure. Thus I hope for a better tomorrow through our own efforts in four ways: continued rescue, alleviation of poverty, greater Jewish identity and more Jewish unity.

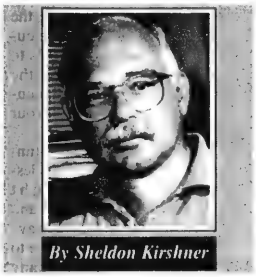
The Kirshner File

Festival features films of Jewish interest

Several movies of Jewish interest were screened at this month's Toronto International Film Festival. Virtually all of them will be released in theatres across Canada later this year and in 1998.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Ira Wohl's 1979 documentary, Best Boy, not only won first prize at festivals across North America, but captured an Academy Award. I did not see Best Boy, but judging by the sequel, Best Man: 'Best Boy' and All of Us Twenty Years Later, one can understand why it was such a critical success.

In Best Boy, Wohl examined the life of his 50-year-old mentally retarded cousin, Philly Wohl, who gradually made the transition from living at home with his parents toward greater independence. By all accounts, it was a heart-warming film.

The same can be said of Best Man, produced, directed and written by Wohl, a Los Angeles-based filmmaker turned psychotherapist.

Best Man, which unfolds in New York City and Los Angeles, does not immediately grow on you, being less than compelling for about the first 30 of its 90 minutes. But as Wolh draws out Philly's personality and then announces his intention to give him a bar mitzvah, at age 70, we're hooked.

Philly, good-natured and shambling, has been diagnosed as "very slow but normal." Though intellectually challenged and child-like, he can perform simple tasks, can relate to people (particularly his widowed sister Frances), can understand his Jewish roots and can summon up enthusiasm for certain foods (hamburgers and beans, cupcakes and danish and bananas in sour cream).

In Best Man, Wohl looks at Philly's adjustment to the group home and training centre in which he has been placed, explores his touching relationship with Frances (a selfless woman and surrogate mother since the death of their parents), follows him to Los Angeles for a Passover seder at Wohl's home and, finally, documents the preparations leading to his abbreviated bar mitzvah.

Thankfully never condescending, the film is crowned with poignant moments. "I miss my momma, poor thing," Philly murmurs. Watching Fiddler on the Roof for the umpteenth time, he revels in its nostalgia. Visiting the graves of his parents before Rosh Hashanah, he is profoundly moved. Attending a Jewish heritage lesson, he confuses basic facts.

Best Man reaches a series of emotional climaxes as Philly rehearses bar mitzvah brachot with an empathetic rabbi originally from Argentina; as he glows at Ira's seder; as he is fitted with a new suit; as he painstakingly succeeds in elevating his bar mitzvah ceremony into a singular event (thus prompting Frances to shed joyful tears); as he comments on his performance; and as the rabbi and Frances dance to the Latin rhythm of a tango.

Best Man comes straight from the heart.

Shanghai, China, was a haven for Jewish refugees after the rise of Nazism, being the only place in the world which admitted Jews without a visa. As a result, upwards of 20,000 German and Austrian Jews streamed into the city, joining a long-established Jewish community which had been settled by Sephardic and Russian Jews in the 19th and early 20th centuries.

Exile Shanghai, by Ulrike Ottinger, describes these separate but overlapping communities in an exhaustive 275-minute German-Israeli documentary based on interviews, photographs and documents.

By way of providing context, Ottinger includes snippets of contemporary Chinese life in this marathon of a film. The camera pans on, among other sights, a nimble noodle maker practising his craft, cyclists riding to work in a drizzle and shoppers wandering through the maze of an outdoor food market.

We learn that the first Jewish settlers arrived after the Opium Wars and that they were followed by Jews fleeing pogroms in Russia. A few, such as the Kadouris and the Hardoons, prospered mightily as traders. They, in turn, assisted Jews fleeing racial oppression in Europe.

Like their Sephardic and Russian predecessors, the newcomers established businesses, institutions, schools and newspapers. But life tended to be hard, and all the more harder after the Japanese occupation. Under pressure from Hitler, Japan herded German and Austrian Jews into the poorest neighborhood, the Hongkew district, where conditions were primitive. In the wake of the war, the vast majority of Jewish residents emigrated.

The narrative unfolds through the reminiscences of six former Jewish residents now citizens of the United States. Their stories are uniformly fascinating, and through them viewers can appreciate the place of Shanghai in Holocaust history.

Until he was caught several years ago, Carlos (The Jackal) Sanchez was one of the most notorious terrorists in the arsenal of the rejectionist Palestinian cause. The son of a Venezuelan doctor, Sanchez was ruthless, but not sufficiently smart enough to avoid detection and incarceration. In The Assignment, Canadian director Christian Duguay plays with the facts at hand to produce a film which conjures up the nerve-wracking hunt for the legendary terrorist by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and the Mossad.

Filmed in Israel, Hungary and Canada, The Assignment turns on an American naval officer (Aidan Quinn) recruited by an obsessive CIA agent (Donald Sutherland) to capture Sanchez. The officer chosen for the task uncannily resembles Sanchez (Quinn). Sutherland's mild-mannered Israeli collaborator is portrayed by Ben Kingsley.

Though full of explosions, shootouts, car chases, sexual situations, exotic locales and foreign intrigue, The Assignment barely leaves a dent. It's a slow-footed spy thriller which largely inspires boredom rather than a true sense of excitement.

***

Bernard Malamud's great novel, The Assistant, finally has been adapted for the screen. As directed by Daniel Petrie, The Assistant is a solid film bolstered by credible performances. Hewing closely to the spirit of the book, Petrie brings out the interlocking themes of crime and punishment, and love and redemption.

Frank Alpine (Gil Bellows), an Italian-American drifter with no apparent prospects, robs Morris Bober, a Jewish grocer, in tandem with an anti-Semitic criminal named Ward Minogue (Jaimz Woolvett). Wracked by guilt, the contrite Alpine returns to the scene to make amends. Convalescing from the brutal robbery, Bober (Armin Mueller-Stahl) hires Alpine, who casts a covetous eye on his daughter, Helen (Kate Greenhouse). In vain, Helen's mother (Joan Plowright) objects to the budding relationship. Tension flares when the Bobers learn of Alpine's role in the robbery.

Happily, The Assistant is the antithesis of a melodramatic Hollywood blockbuster. And true to its literary origins, it works its magic quietly and effectively.

***

An eccentric Russian-Jewish tailor (Seymour Cassel) touches off a mystery and a romance between a stone mason and a musician in Peter Schr's Obsession, set in Berlin and Paris. On the whole, an engaging film.

***

A bored housewife. A Nazi war criminal. Put the pair into the mix and you get Stolen Moments, a mannered Argentine film which takes place in the bleakness of Patagonia in 1947.

Rabbinic Reflections

Jews can help speed redemption

By RABBI Y. BENAMOU AND GARY DOLOVICH

This Shabbat, the combined parshiot of Nitzavim and Vayeilech will be read. This is the Shabbat preceding the High Holy Days of Rosh Hashanah, the 10 days of repentance and the holiest day of the year, Yom Kippur. Although these two parshiot are ripe with issues worthy of careful and serious consideration we want to focus on one pasuk (verse) that we believe is particularly relevant given the upcoming holidays.

In Parshat Nitzavim it says (Devarim 30:6) that "HaShem, your God, will circumcise your heart and the heart of your offspring, to love HaShem, your God, with all your heart and with all your soul, that you may live." The pasuk comes at a time when Moses, during his last days, is comforting the Jewish people that eventually they will repent and be redeemed from their sufferings, their sorrows and from their future exile from the land of Israel.

Ibn Ezra, one of the great commentators on the Torah, explains the verse as a contrast with the brit milah, the circumcision which is performed on every Jewish male at eight days of age. Whereas the brit milah is the physical removal of the foreskin, an act that signifies the entry of the child into the covenant between HaShem and the Jewish people, the circumcision spoken of here is a spiritual one, symbolizing the removal of the barriers which prevent people from becoming closer to God.

Nachmanidies, another of the classical commentators, in a similar vein, explains that the "forsaken" is a spiritual barrier that prevents goodness from prevailing over the desire to sin.

The verse really is a promise that eventually God Himself will remove these barriers so that everyone will finally and completely come to know the truth about HaShem and the expectations He has for His creation.

Does this mean though that we are off the hook? That we can simply sit back and wait for the final redemption and the Mashiach to come? The answer is no.

The Talmud teaches that although the final redemption will come at its appointed time, the Jewish people, can, through their commitment to Torah, hasten that redemption. Moreover, it is taught that "...if one comes to purify himself, he is assisted [by God]" (Shabbos 104a).

This means that it is incumbent upon each and every one of us, especially at this time of the year, to do all he or she can to examine him or herself and see what he or she can do as an individual, as part of a family, and as a member of a community to remove the spiritual barriers that stand in the way of a perfect commitment to God and God's mitzvot. We must seek to examine ourselves and identify those things which mark our spiritual "foreskin." Having done that, we must then work very hard to peel them off, layer by layer by layer. We must circumcise ourselves.

Yes, God will help us finish the job — our verse promises us as much. But, just as HaShem has given us the physical brit milah as a sign that we must participate in the act of perfecting God's world, so too must we take an active and meaningful role in our own spiritual growth.

Each one of us needs to do this. No one is exempt. And although this is a lifelong project, this is the best time of the year to start working on it.

L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu VeTichatemmu. May we all be inscribed and sealed in the Book of Live for a year of success and happiness and blessing.

Survivor weaves a tale of terror and triumph

The Endless Wait*, by Joseph Peretz (Lugus Publication (no price indicated)).

The author of The Endless Wait, a native of Antwerp, served in the Belgian army that was so quickly overwhelmed by the Nazis. Interned in a German labor camp, he managed to escape from a death train on its way to Auschwitz. "It was only about four feet from the platform down to the track, yet I felt as if I had dived headlong into a bottomless abyss. Hoping that the railroad car would shield me from the guard's view, I subconsciously expected to hear the bark of his machine gun firing at my back. In a crouch, I started running as fast as I could, meanwhile ripping of my yellow Star of David."

In north France, reunited with a girlfriend who has survived under an assumed name, he witnessed the liberation of a happy community. "The main street was lined with people, in some spots, three deep. It seemed as if the entire population had taken to the street to witness the long awaited event. Hanging out of the open windows, the tricolor fluttered in the breeze. The pavement shook as huge tanks rumbled by. The liberating soldiers sitting on top of the gigantic iron monsters, their goggles pushed up on their foreheads, smiled and waved at the jubilant crowd welcoming them, throwing flowers, clapping hands, yelling, 'Vive les Allies! Vive la France!' at the top of their voices."

He and his bride, who were the first Jews married in Antwerp after the liberation, eventually made their way to Toronto.

This survivor's story of terror and triumph deserves a wide readership.

The genealogist as detective

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Here's a short tale to illustrate that even official documents can lie and that a genealogist often has to be a good detective to get at the truth.

The Citizenship Registration Branch of the federal Department of the Secretary of State (P.O. Box 7000, Sydney, N.S. B1P 6V6) can provide details about a citizen's date of arrival and naturalization. Some years ago, that office informed me that my great-grandfather Harris Glickstein "came to Canada from London, England, by way of Black Rock, N.Y., some time in 1908."

This, I knew, was wrong. True, my Polish-born great-grandfather had grown up in London, but a U.S. passenger list offered proof that he did not arrive in New York until April 1909.

I wrote to the Reference Services Section of the National Archives of Canada (395 Wellington St., Ottawa K1A 0N3), which suggested a search of the U.S.-to-Canada border crossing records (available through many libraries). "Unfortunately, a search of various gazetteers has failed to produce any reference to Black Rock, New York," the letter read.

Where was this mysterious Black Rock through which my great-grandfather supposedly crossed? Through a chance discovery, I learned that Black Rock was a town that merged anonymously with Buffalo early in this century. Next question: If my great-grandfather left the United States from Black Rock, at what Canadian port did he land?

The National Archives supplied a list of some 30 Ontario ports, including Crystal Beach, Fort Erie, Erie Beach, Lewiston and Niagara Falls.

Then there was Bridgeburg, which was described as being near Fort Erie, Ont. I was instantly drawn to the name – Bridgeburg, city of the bridge – but no amount of searching by map or gazetteer could help me locate it.

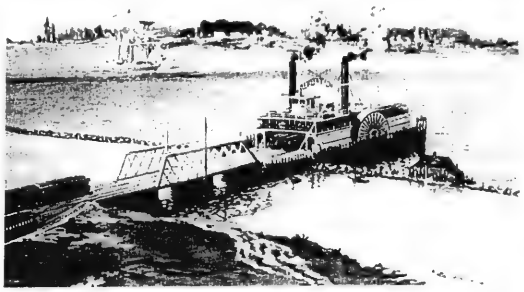
On a hunch, I ordered the three Bridgeburg microfilms, which like all Canadian passenger lists are unindexed, and I painstakingly wound through the first reel (May 1908 to Aug. 1911). Halfway through the second reel, in the midst of the January 1913 arrivals, I found my great-grandfather.

Unlike their American counterparts, Canadian passenger lists do not give place of birth or the names of relatives back home or at a destination. This record described my great-grandfather as a 37-year-old tailor of Russian-Hebrew descent, a citizen of Russia, travelling alone from Brooklyn to Toronto with $80 in his pocket. (No mention of his wife and three children in Brooklyn who would soon follow.)

A railway ferry once operated between Black Rock and Bridgeburg, I later learned. At each terminus, a wooden truss bridge extended into the water, connecting the steam-powered ferry to the train tracks.

Bridgeburg was probably never much of a town. It may have possessed one end of a railway bridge, a customs inspection office and little else.

Its chief distinguishing feature, the wooden truss bridge, was apparently demolished after the ferry stopped running in the mid-1920s.



Many immigrants crossed the Niagara River on this railroad ferry

The Jewish Highway

Exploring the Torah on the World Wide Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, more of the best sites on the Jewish Highway, with a focus on the Torah...plus a Rosh Hashanah bonus.

I have raved about Navigating the Bible [http://bible.ort.org/] before and I will do so again. Every verse of the Torah can be viewed in Hebrew, in Hebrew transliterated into English and in English [http://bible.ort.org/bible/index/inx_tora.htm]. Since each verse appears as a picture rather than as text, you can read the Hebrew on your computer even if you don't have Hebrew fonts installed. And last but not least, if you want to have the verse sung to you, just click on the little speaker icon. And if your browser can read Hebrew (subject of a future column) you can read the entire Tanach at the Hebrew University Bible site [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/mbible.html]. And in English at [http://bible.ort.org/bible/index/inx_tora.htm].

If you want to study some Torah, then don't miss The Torahnet Page: Torah Study Opportunities on the Net [http://shamash.org/reform/uahc/torahnet/]. This is a very handy centralized listing of Jewish Web sites and e-mail lists available on the Internet. The beauty of subscribing to an e-mail list is that you will receive a regular mailing in your e-mail box, so that you can continue your learning on a regular basis. Also, check out the Shema Yisrael Torah Network [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/].

Jews may be the People of the Book, but the folks at 613.org [http://www.613.org/] have a different way of expressing it. Through over 300 hours of Jewish audio and video, 613.org presents numerous classes, short stories and songs. It's not every Web site that can boast being "The First World-Wide Jewish Audio Since Mount Sinai."

And here's that promised Rosh Hashanah bonus: I can still remember those long nights years ago when I stayed up to help stamp, lick and seal our family's Rosh Hashanah cards. Although those cards don't seem to be as popular as they once were, you can now send off a free Rosh Hashanah card to anyone with an e-mail address. The prettiest cards can be found at [http://www.hagim.co.il/brachot.html]. Although your message is sent in English, you will need Hebrew fonts installed in your browser in order to read the instructions. Also, keep your greeting innocuous since anyone can browse old messages. You can find more electronic postcards at [http://www.marlo.com/hashana.htm].

They're almost as much fun to send as the old kind of cards and they won't leave the taste of glue in your mouth!

Next week, more of the best on the Jewish Highway with some sites from the religious movements.

Feminist author brings unique views to liturgy

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

'Must keep Hebrew alive'

TORONTO — She has been called a pantheist and an atheist, but poet and Judaic scholar Marcia Falk, giving her first talk in Canada, said she is not afraid of labels.

"I've been called so many things lately," she said. "My answer is: 'Where do we find peace? And I go toward it.'"

The feminist author of a new gender-inclusive prayer book, Book of Blessings, a 13-year-project, spoke to 225 people recently at Holy Blossom Temple.

"As a poet, I'm drawn to the lyrical intensity of the Hebrew blessings, but I'm uncomfortable with the heavily patriarchal picture of God in traditional liturgy and a lot of creativity begins with discomfort."

Her book has a new version of the Sh'ma, one of the best known pieces of Jewish liturgy. She replaces the classic declaration, "Hear O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One," with a prayer about the unity of creation: "Hear, O Israel/ The Divine abounds everywhere/ and dwells in everything/The many are One."

Whereas the traditional Hamotzi prayer, praising God for bringing forth bread from the earth, begins, "Blessed are you Lord our God, King of the Universe," her adaptation introduces the blessing with N'vareych et eyn hachayim, Let us bless the source of life."

She has also written blessings to be recited upon awakening and on going to sleep. For the Friday evening service, she substitutes a suite of poetry in Hebrew, Yiddish and English, including poems by the Yiddish poet, Malka Heifetz Tussman, and the Israeli poet, Leah Goldberg, as well as two of her own poems which celebrate human connection with the natural world.

"In traditional liturgy, our voices [those of women] are completely unheard," she said.

It was her commitment to Judaism which made her a feminist, she added.

Although she thinks Hebrew prayers need to be briefer, she said, "If we want to keep civilization alive, we must keep Hebrew alive; without that, there is no hope. Send your kids to Hebrew school. My mother is 86 and she is teaching Hebrew."

Marcia Falk

As for her Book of Blessings, which sells in hard cover for about $60, "I am not making bubkes on the book." The cost of typesetting the Hebrew in it is what keeps the price high, Falk said.

In the question period, Falk said she is not deterred by criticism that she is advocating paganism. "Paganism is a buzzword that stops debate."

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Kolel director, said Falk's new prayer book "represents not only a change of words, but a change of heart."

The talk was co-sponsored by Kolel, Holy Blossom Temple Sisterhood and Canadian Women for Reform Judaism. Sheila Smolkin, president of Canadian Women for Reform Judaism also spoke.

Communal leaders get life lesson in Jewish program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An intensive two-year Jewish educational program for up-and-coming Jewish community leaders has no in-class tests for participants. "Their lives are their tests," said Rabbi Nathan Laufer during a recent visit to Toronto to introduce the program here.

Rabbi Laufer is president of the Wexner Heritage Foundation (WHF), the brainchild in the early 1980s of Leslie Wexner, the Columbus, Ohio-based founder of The Limited chain of clothing stores.

The foundation, with a seven-figure annual budget, underwrites the cost of the program and boasts an elite faculty of dozens of Jewish thinkers including professors, rabbis, authors and Israeli politicians.

Among the guest speakers at a recent summer institute in Israel were Labor party leader Ehud Barak, former deputy foreign minister Yossi Beilin and Israeli president Ezer Weizman.

Rabbi Nathan Laufer

The program runs every other week, and participants receive up to 100 pages of study material on Jewish history, theology or philosophy per four-hour session. Faculty members, handpicked to suit the community's needs, are flown in to teach.

In one exercise at a summer institute (not all of which are held in Israel; some are in North America), participants examine "what they stand for as Jews and human beings, and what they would like their children to stand for."

Wexner, the story goes, had been asked to lead the United Jewish Appeal's American campaign and organized the foundation's pilot project to fill the gaps in his own Jewish background.

Rabbi Laufer's visit to Toronto, at his initiative, represents WHF's first foray into the Canadian Jewish community after running the program for a total of over 40 groups in 28 American cities.

He has also met with community leaders in Montreal and is scheduled to do the same in Vancouver late next month.

UJA Federation officials here were happy to welcome the foundation.

"It's a rare opportunity when someone's prepared to come in at their own expense and provide perhaps the best program of its kind in the world," said Alan Reitzes, executive director of UJA Federation. "If you're committed to Jewish life and being a leader, there's nothing that can top this experience."

Participants, age 30 to 45, must be nominated and screened in personal interviews before being admitted to the program.

Wexner felt that many of the leaders in the Jewish community a dozen years ago were "what he termed empty suits," said Rabbi Laufer. "They were impressive business people, very successful, but not people who had a lot of Jewish content. They didn't have Jewish values or Jewish vision. He felt the community was getting poor leadership."

Likely candidates for the program are "people likely to become the presidents of their agencies or institutions or schools and [who] can really make a difference in their community," said the rabbi.

A youthful 40-year-old Brooklyn native with smichah from Yeshiva University and a law degree from Fordham University, Rabbi Laufer personifies the qualities like commitment, vision and communication skills he seeks in participants.

He is in fact not only president of the foundation but one of its faculty members (although he says he teaches only if he can do so "as well as or better than anyone else"). He has been with the foundation almost a dozen years.

"You can't sell something you don't know yourself," he argues. Even day school graduates, if they didn't pursue their Jewish education, "have a 16-year-old's understanding of Judaism.

"Would you buy the same thing as a 40-year-old as you would as a 16-year-old?" he asks.

Graduates of the program, among them four presidents of local Jewish federations, have taken on a variety of local and national leadership positions, said Rabbi Laufer. One has started a synagogue, another a Reform day school.

"This is an investment in the future of the North American people."

Winshevsky Shule marks 70th year

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Morris Winchevsky Community Shule (MWCS) is marking its 70th anniversary this year, with a return to formal Yiddish language studies, which formed the school's roots.

Operated by the United Jewish People's Order (UJPO), a secular Jewish organization, the MWCS had traditionally placed a strong emphasis on the teaching of Yiddish and Yiddish culture rather than Hebrew and Jewish liturgy, Maxine Hermolin, UJPO executive director, said in a recent interview.

During the formative years of the school, some of Toronto's foremost Yiddishists – Manya Lipshitz, Nechama Yanovsky and Label Basman – taught there, but by the '90s formal Yiddish language studies had lapsed, Hermolin said.

She stressed that formal study of Yiddish has been reintroduced into the curriculum and the students will also be learning some Hebrew this year.

The school's new educational director, Marcy Gilbert, who was also present at the interview, explained that the program provides students with the opportunity to learn about Jewish heritage and traditions within a secular humanistic framework.

"The fundamental philosophy of the shule [school] as a community is the need for the community to work for Tikkun Olam, making the world a better place," Gilbert said.

The curriculum emphasizes Jewish history and holidays, Yiddish language and literature and Jewish folk creativity in dance, song and drama, she said. The groups are split between junior and senior grades and there is a cultural component, with each child choosing an option: newspaper, debating club, dance, drama, cooking and story telling, she said.

Each grade studies a particular theme and in Grade 7 there is a b'nai mitzvah program with a formal graduation.

The classes, which run from kindergarten to Grade 7, are small and intimate. Some 80 children are now enrolled and registration for the 1997-98 year is still open, she noted.

For every holiday celebration, connections are made to a relevant social action project, Hermolin said. Last year on Sukkot a speaker from the Out of the Cold program spoke to the school, which sponsored a clothing and blanket drive for the homeless, she said. And the year before, there had been a speaker from the Shalom Food Project and a corresponding food drive.

Every year, the whole school goes to Camp Naivelt in Brampton, which is run by UJPO, to celebrate Sukkot; the community goes apple picking there and presents a bushel of apples to the breakfast program operated by the Shalom food project, she said.

She said that in conjunction with Rosh Hashanah this year, students from Grades 4 and up will be participating in a walk on Sept. 28, to raise money for AIDS research.

The school is very much a community of families according to Hermolin. "This community welcomes and embraces and intercultural and non-traditional families ... We have a rich diverse community.

"We care for each other. We celebrate holidays together. Every holiday has a ceremony."

Kashrut in Toronto

Cost of Passover products troublesome

house brand products under kosher supervision, which brings their cost down considerably, since they are under the same price considerations as the non-kosher product.

The higher prices for Israeli and United States products reflect the increased costs for shipping and handling which are incorporated into the sale price, according to a spokesperson from IGA.

Passover Products

The high cost of Passover products is a constant thorn in the side of kosher consumers.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of the Kashruth Council, explained that supervision of Passover products is even stricter than that of regular products during the year. Things which might be acceptable all year round, may not be acceptable on Passover.

He cited the example of sugar. Ordinarily, sugar does not need a hechsher at all. But, because the people packing it may use gloves coated with cornstarch, which is chametz, prohibited on Passover, even a minute quantity may seep into the sugar.

Therefore the stricter supervision which would be unnecessary during the year, becomes imperative at Passover.

Even with the needs for heightened supervision there is recognition at the Kashruth Council that some stores raise the price of Passover food beyond a reasonable amount.

"Our Vaad and other ones as well have appealed to merchants to keep the costs down," Rabbi Levin said. "But it is for the customer to insist. Promoting competition is the best way to keep costs down."

Rabbi Jay Kelman, associate rabbi of Beth Jacob Congregation in North York however, favors a more active approach to keeping Passover costs down.

He advocates establishing a volunteer monitoring service, where people compare prices at different stores, not just during Passover, but between the holiday and the rest of the year.

In that way, he says, people would be able to avoid shopping at those stores that charged over a certain price.

This is not a new concept, Rabbi Kelman said. It has been done before in New York, and at various times in Jewish history.

In fact, a similar protest occurred in Toronto shortly before World War I. When the price of a loaf of bread went up to 12 cents, the local housewives boycotted the bakeries with the result that eventually, the prices dropped.

Rabbi Kelman is convinced that store owners "would fall in line, if they know the community is organized behind the effort."

People have complained about COR's new rules

Kashrut certification

Some people have complained about new rules which COR has implemented regarding the granting of kashrut certification. They expressed concern that new certification for restaurants, catering establishments and butcher shops are only being given to people who are themselves religiously observant. A "grandfather" clause allows continued supervision to businesses that were so certified before the new rules came into effect.

The Kashruth Council explains their decisions as being a matter of trust.

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth, says that "to maintain maximum standards of kashrut, we have to have people who care themselves. If someone doesn't care about Shabbat and Halachah, for instance, why should they care about complex halachic standards [of kashrut]?"

This is particularly true, Rabbi Kerzner said, of "24-hour situations," like a restaurant or catering facility, where food is constantly being brought in and handled, as opposed to a manufacturing company, which generally operates on a business day schedule.

In fact, he noted, COR certifies many manufacturing facilities, processing plants and similar businesses that belong to both non-Jews and non-observant Jews.

He added that when kashrut certification is given on an occasional basis to a facility such as a hotel or hall that offers kosher catering, whoever the owner, operator or caterer is, "we have a mashgiach there at all times, who keeps the key to the kitchen and stores, so we are in total control."

This explanation however does not satisfy those people who see the new rules as representing a sharp departure from practices that were acceptable in former times.

They also make the claim that the new rules operate in a discriminatory and unfair manner.

COR is willing to certify non-Jewish establishments but not establishments owned by Jews who may be personally non-observant. Yet by COR's own reasoning, these people point out, the distinction is unfair and illogical.

Why should COR assume that a non-Jewish proprietor will be more trustworthy and reliable in terms of compliance with Kashrut requirements than a non-observant Jewish proprietor? In both cases, they point out, the establishments will have to rely on the guidance of the mashgiach.

Again, Rabbi Kerzner repeated, COR (and other certifying bodies) question how trustworthy in terms of kashrut observance someone will be who does not feel called upon to himself or herself observe other commandments.

Vegetables

A fairly recent consumer concern has arisen in connection with the use of vegetables, especially the leafy, green variety, like broccoli, spinach and lettuce, at catering establishments and restaurants. COR has prohibited their use at mass functions.

The problem, explained Rabbi Levin, is that with government bans on the use of pesticides, many more

Israel's short history has been marked by incredible change. From a fledgling agricultural state in 1948, Israel has grown into a thriving technological leader and is now among the economic elite of the Western world.

There has, however, been one thing that could never be changed. Israel is the eternal home of the Jewish people.

In order for Israel to continue to be strong, it must continue to grow. Infrastructure – highways, dams, hydro electric developments – are the foundation upon which economic growth is built. Israel Bonds provide working capital for this growing economy.

Israel Bonds are an opportunity for Jews to unite in support of a common vision – that our hope, our dream to be a free people in our land will never be lost. It is a promise that we make to ourselves. It is a proclamation we make to the world.

Support the growth of the Jewish state.
Make yourself part of the Jewish dream.
Invest in the future of the Jewish people.

Costs of keeping kosher

bugs are lodging in folds and flowerets of vegetables. In a private home it is not too onerous to carefully check a head of lettuce or broccoli. But in a large facility, which might easily use several hundred lettuces for a salad course at a dinner, it is far more problematic.

Insects, it must be recalled are absolutely prohibited for eating.

Rabbi Levin said that "a whole booklet" has been sent out giving detailed instructions on how to deal with the problem, including meticulous washing and preparation.

For some vegetables, it is sufficient to check three items from each box of produce. It is also acceptable to use vegetables like asparagus and broccoli "if they are cleaned, washed, inspected, and then ground up [such as for soup]" the rabbi said.

Some vegetables, like romaine lettuce, require so much checking that "it is simply not warranted," Rabbi Levin said.

He did add however, that new technologies like hydroponics may help the situation.

The upshot of the vegetable situation is that people planning a large celebration, a wedding or bar mitzvah party for example, are very limited in the vegetables they can use for the meal, and even the salads they can serve.

Many people ask: is COR being too strict?

Private caterers

Aubie Himel, catering co-chair of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue, has another problem. The proliferation of private catering establishments and premises that offer kosher catering under COR certification is harming the viability of the community's synagogues.

"Of course they can charge less," Himel said, explaining that the private enterprises do not have to worry about synagogue maintenance or about sharing part of their revenue with the synagogue.

Whenever catering business is down in synagogues, the lost revenues, he said, affects their ability to work for Jewish continuity and Jewish education, responsibilities hotels and private catering establishments do not have. As well, he said, without the income from catering, "synagogues have to raise dues, and that means we will lose 40 to 50 families from our membership."

Himel and others point to the irony that the community, through its central kashrut supervision apparatus, is making it increasingly difficult for the synagogue, one of the key religious and cultural instruments of the community to engage fully in the fight to ensure continuity.

Conclusion

As we stated at the very outset of these articles, one of the proofs of the vitality of Jewish life in the greater Toronto area is the fact that we have a strong, central body regulating kashrut.

The variety of choice, the reliability of the supervision and the sophistication of the body's work are tremendous and much appreciated assets in the community.

But when it came to researching the questions and concerns that have arisen in relation to COR's work, this reporter discovered an atmosphere of silence in the community that is disturbing.

A number of people had expressed privately quite genuine concerns, but refused either to go on the record or allow any kind of dialogue through the publication of this series out of fear, they claimed, that their businesses would be harmed.

As a result, it was difficult in certain circumstances to judge the merits of their complaints.

But a community can only be truly healthy and whole, when issues of concern are aired through open communication among all parties. Until that communication unfolds, there will be a noticeable flaw in this otherwise most impressive picture of kashrut in our community.

Higher form of Kashrut?

Genesis 1:20 is the first instruction on kashrut in the Torah: "Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, on which is the fruit yielding seed; to you it shall be for food."

It suggests that vegetarianism is the ideal form of eating. In fact many Torah scholars, including Rabbi Abraham Kook, the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Palestine (as it was then), have believed this.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, has been a vegetarian for nearly 20 years. She and her family follow a vegetarian lifestyle not for health reasons, but as a higher form of kashrut, observing the injunction of tsaar baalei chayim, not to cause undue suffering to animals.

Rabbi Goldstein points outs that according to many, including Rabbi Kook, permission to eat meat was G-d's concession to human weakness. "We didn't eat meat in Gan Eden. After the flood, Noah was given that permission. We see it [meat eating] as a fallen state."

Rabbi Goldstein and her family take vegetarianism even one step further. She incorporates into her dietary approach, Arthur Waskow's philosophy of eco-kashrut.

Eco-kashrut demands that animals used for slaughter be raised in a humane manner. By this requirement for example, veal would not be permissible for eating "even if it is shchitahed according to kosher principles, because it isn't raised according to kosher principles."

Eco-kashrut also requires that workers employed in the food industry be treated fairly. Thus, Rabbi Goldstein cited the exploitation of migrant grape harvest workers as a reason to disqualify the eating of grapes that those workers harvested. "If workers are so maltreated, against the ethics of employment [in Jewish law], we shouldn't say the food they grow is kosher, even if it is something like grapes, which are inherently kosher."

Rabbi Goldstein also pointed out that many of our (non-vegetarian) notions of kashrut are the result of the cultural components which we have defined as "Jewish eating" which in fact, are European Ashkenazi concepts. For example, "Ethiopian and Indian Jews don't eat chicken soup with matzah balls."

It is generally regarded as common custom that celebratory occasions include a meat or poultry element in the festive meal. Most sages have ruled this to be the case. Rabbi Kerzner told The CJN, "that is certainly not mandatory."

And if you think there is no true simchah, and certainly no elegant one, without meat, Rabbi Goldstein recommended "come to a vegetarian wedding." She said that she sends kosher caterers gourmet recipes for vegetarian dishes so she and her family can have an elegant meal too.

"Keeping kosher is a challenge in itself," Rabbi Goldstein said. "We [vegetarians] feel just as commanded by the ethics of vegetarianism, and we can't imagine breaking them."

It is sometimes thought that vegetarianism obviates the need to be concerned with observing dietary law details. However, this is not the case.

There are always concerns about ingredients. For example even oil may pose a problem depending upon what is in it. The term "vegetable oil" does not always mean that there is absolutely no animal fat in the product.

Cheese too is generally problematic because it may contain rennet, a coagulant which often contains animal products.

The same concerns over ingredients apply to grocery stores that are called vegetarian. Not only is it sometimes difficult for the average consumer to recognize the name of some of the ingredients listed on a package, but consumer labelling laws exempt small amounts from having to be included in the ingredient list.

This is not to suggest any dishonesty or lack of care on the part of those who operate vegetarian establishments. They may simply not know the many complicated intricacies of kashrut, and without the presence of a mashgiach can easily slip up even with the best will in the world.

UJA Federation Campaign '98

CAMPAIGNERS ENCOURAGE NEW GIFTS

UJA Federation wants to expand its family. This Sunday, September 28, hundreds of volunteers will be enlisting new supporters for UJA Federation's work on behalf of Jews in need.

Last year 3,000 new donors were welcomed to the UJA Federation family that has grown to 27,000 committed supporters. Earlier this month, a series of telethons, launched by Super Sunday, brought the campaign total to over $23 million so far.

The drive to attract new gifts was given an extra boost two years ago when UJA Federation introduced the Three Year Vision – an initiative through which donors were asked to pledge their support for three consecutive years to give campaigners more time to contact non-contributors. About 8,000 donors subscribed to the Three Year Vision.

"This is the last year in which we can do what we promised and try to reach new people," stresses Reesa Sud, who is co-chairing New Gifts Sunday with Debbi Stern. Sud and Stern, who have both been recognized for their exemplary campaigning over the years, are pleased the drive for new gifts is taking place so soon after a highly energized Super Sunday.

Reesa Sud

Debbi Stern

"I am certain the community will recognize the importance of UJA Federation and the need to expand our donor base," says Stern.

Participants in New Gifts Sunday can collect Frequent Flyer points and become eligible to win free tickets on UJA Federation missions to Ottawa and Israel. Prizes including Blue Jay memorabilia, Cineplex Odeon movie passes, and restaurant vouchers will also be given out.

To sign up for a shift, call (416) 635-2883 ext 115.

March Marks 10th Year

Applications for the UJA Federation funded March of the Living mission , April 19 – May 4, to Poland and Israel are now available in many Metro area high schools.

Every two years over a hundred Toronto high school students join 6,000 of their counterparts from all over the world for a lesson in history, which begins in Poland with a three kilometre journey by foot from Auschwitz to Birkenau, the largest concentration camp built by the Nazis during WWII. The second leg of the mission takes participants to Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Those interested in the program are invited to attend a March of the Living information session on October 8, 7:00 p.m. at the Lipa Green building, 4600 Bathurst Street. Applications must be submitted by November 14.

A special conference is being conducted in Israel, December 30 – January 6, for the International March of the Living alumni to mark the 10th anniversary of the March. Conference highlights include meetings with high level government officials, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, study sessions and a memorial ceremony at the Kotel.

Thousands of high school students and chaperones from all over the world march together in a show of solidarity and strength. Photo by Nir Bareket.

Marlo Shaw, a 23 year old Queen's Law School student who participated in the 1990 March of the Living, hopes to make it to Israel for the conference. "I made a vow to myself when I came home from the March of the Living that I will always maintain a strong connection with the Jewish community," she says.

Barbara Bank, chair of the 1998 March of the Living, says she's "proud to be a part of a program with such a tremendous amount of integrity."

"Our alumni come away with a sense of obligation to live more complete Jewish lives on behalf of the millions who perished," adds Bank. "They really make the experience count."

For more information about the March of the Living, or the alumni conference, please call Karen Worb at (416) 631-5731.

Training Compassionate Campaigners

Two years ago UJA Federation revolutionized the way campaigners relate to donors by sending contributors personalized thank-you notes. Miriam Rosenberg and Richard Sadowski are taking campaigner training a step further by emphasizing sensitivity and compassion towards donors.

"We want to bring some passion into a process that can often be mechanical," explains Sadowski, who is co-chairing UJA Federation canvasser training for the 1998 campaign with Miriam Rosenberg. "We have asked our campaigners to share a little of themselves and their commitment to UJA Federation when they call potential donors," he adds.

"By sharing their enthusiasm and personal experiences, campaigners can capture not only the ear of the person at the other end of the phone, but their hearts as well," explains Rosenberg. "It's like an emotional trickle down effect."

When Bernard Betel Centre For Creative Living volunteer Evelyn Rabkin spoke to 30 trainers before campaign began, Sadowski says her ability to "tug at our heart strings was an added bonus."

Miriam Rosenberg

Richard Sadowski

"Her story about losing her husband and the loneliness that followed, touched us all," adds Rosenberg.

Other changes introduced this year include smaller, more customized training groups and a more user-friendly manual which provides campaigners with responses to frequently asked questions.

Both Rosenberg and Sadowski believe more compassion and understanding will go a long way to building a wide base of community support for UJA Federation.

Continuity program provides support for converts

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Claudette Edghill, a single woman, completed her conversion classes and became a Jew one year ago, she realized that something was missing in the community.

"Recent converts need a mentor to show them around – where to buy kosher groceries, find kosher restaurants and even help them kosher their kitchen. They also need to meet people in a similar situation. I was fortunate to have friends to help, but not all converts are that lucky," she says.

Edghill did not know that this had been a matter of concern to the Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region, for a number of years. What evolved some six months ago was a unique group, whose goals mirror Edghill's concerns.

Partners in Jewish Living, a project funded by the action committee on Jewish continuity of UJA Federation, was set up "in order to give Jews by choice and their families an opportunity for ongoing Jewish study and mutual support," says Rabbi Irvin Beigel, interim rabbi at Beth Sholom Synagogue and rabbinic coordinator of the group.

When someone converts to Judaism, says Rabbi Beigel, there are issues to face that are unique to their situation. "What do they do when their non-Jewish parent dies? What do they do when their parents want them to celebrate a non-Jewish holiday with them?"

He says that Partners in Jewish Living gives people the opportunity to gather and discuss these and any other issues that may be of concern. "Its a support group and a study group geared at converts who may feel a little lost after their conversion classes have ended."

One of the objectives, he says, is to help people integrate into their Jewish community. "One of our concerns about converts is that we teach them about Jewish observance and then they go out and meet Jews who are not observant in that way."

Edghill, a member of Adath Israel Synagogue, has become active in Partners in Jewish Living. The group, she says, offers support to people "who have to deal with the families they are coming from and with their new Jewish family. We also have to contribute to Judaism. Converts should have a responsibility to help. I'm hoping that as a group, we can instil this feeling."

Since its inception, the group has had three study evenings and has "put together an active planning committee that is enthusiastic about moving the group ahead. There is a marvelous core of people working hard to make it a success," says Rabbi Beigel.

Claudette Edghill

Partners in Jewish Living, he says, is a great opportunity to let people get to know each other and "explore how we, as Jews, live in a world that isn't Jewish. There is a spectrum of responses. Some people hide from the secular world and others assimilate. Most people, however, are somewhere in between and people coming to Judaism have to deal with that issue."

Rabbi Beigel, who is from New York, says there have been programs in the United States for converts, but this group is unique in that "its members are actively involved in planning. They are setting the course. I am there to offer my knowledge and expertise, but they are running the show."

Partners in Jewish Living is sponsoring a weekend Nov. 14 to 16, at Maple Lake Resort and Conference Centre in Parry Sound. It will feature a traditional Shabbat, guest speaker Dr. Aaron Nussbaum, recreational facilities before and after Shabbat, and all meals and snacks. Anyone single or married, who may be preparing for or has completed conversion to Judaism as well as their partners and children are invited. Some subsidies are available.

Schochet to help fight against cults, drugs

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's Jewish community has a new full-time resource person to try to help stem the tides of cults and drugs.

Rena Schochet already has 18 cases on her roster, about a third of which involve Jews in cults.

Schochet stresses, however, that she doesn't work directly with the victims. Rather, she "empowers" family members and other loved ones to enable them to deal with the problem.

Schochet is setting up an office here of Torah Life and Living, a Florida-based outreach group that has offered American Jews anti-cult and drug counselling for a decade.

Apart from running the toll-free National Anti-Missionary and Cult Hotline, Torah Life and Living's executive director, Aaron Schwartzbaum, travels anywhere he's needed in North America to help bring Jews who have fallen in with a cult back into the Jewish fold.

Schochet, a soft-spoken grandmother of four, said she sees her role as being more of a reference point, and sees herself as someone who can help families of victims not only cope, but solve the problem.

"I'm really a resource person who's qualified to help family members," she told The CJN. "I try to get parents to strengthen one another, and to emotionally bolster them to carry out advice. I'm like an empathetic wall with ears."

She hopes to complement the work of Jews for Judaism and its expert on cults, especially those on college campuses, Rabbi Michael Skobac.

She also gets calls from Jewish families whose children are interdating, and from people who are just lonely. But the calls so far are mainly about drug use and from people whose children or spouses have joined a cult.

Several U.S. studies have found a disproportionate number of Jews drawn to cults and Schochet says there's no reason to believe it's different in Canada.

According to Torah Life and Living, it's estimated there are between 300 and 400 cults and cult-like groups in the United States and many have operations in this country. They range from the obvious to the more subtle, like white-collar organizations specializing in pyramid marketing schemes that make it difficult, if not impossible, to quit.

And studies have also found that Jewish families are not immune from illicit drug use.

Schochet, the wife of Rabbi Avi Schochet, principal at Eitz Chaim Day School, is also a facilitator for Jewish Family & Child Service, where she leads a support group for agunot.

She was director for seven years of Ohr Somayach's women's study program and taught high school in Johannesburg for 15 years. As well, she has a Jewish Marriage Education Certificate, counselling brides-to-be on Jewish law within marriage.

Schochet says she'll work one-on-one with any affected family, in a completely non-judgmental way.

If her approach doesn't work, she says, she can refer families to experts for more immediate help.

Funds are being raised for the Toronto office of Torah Life and Living. Schochet can be reached by calling 905-709-6183. Her pager number is 416-375-1611.

Intrusive or sensitive: striking the right balance

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The day after the triple suicide bombing on Jerusalem's Ben Yehuda Street, I picked up the phone to place a long-distance call to a total stranger — Vancouver dentist Sherri Wise, believed to be the only Canadian injured in the blast — and ask her what it was like.

As a journalist, I often pose questions I might be too reserved to ask otherwise, but the thought of stirring up Wise's raw emotions so soon after the bombing made me distinctly uncomfortable.

Opinion

It's one thing to seek comments from politicians and spokespeople who field media queries as part of their jobs, or to interview someone after setting up an appointment to do so. It's another to call a hospital room thousands of miles away and speak to someone in whom we've developed a sudden interest because of their involvement in a tragedy.

Had Wise been a friend of mine, I would have called to find out how she was and offer support. I wouldn't have dreamed of asking what exactly she remembered of the circumstances surrounding the blast.

As a journalist, I wouldn't think of not asking that question — and similarly intrusive ones.

I don't see my opposing instincts as a source of major conflict. I like to think I can be a human being and a journalist at the same time. I try — not always as successfully as I would like — to bring sensitivity to my work.

The day of my interview with Wise, a colleague mentioned hearing a radio talk show caller say she was more upset about Princess Diana's death than about the bombing in Jerusalem because she "knew" Diana through so many media reports.

I hope that caller saw Wise on a television newscast that Friday night or read about her in one of the daily newspapers that weekend. (I suspect she doesn't read The CJN.)

By allowing us to let readers and viewers "know" her, even just a little, Wise helped people understand an event to which perhaps they felt they had no connection.

Speaking with her, I was struck by how "together" she seemed. I admired her fortitude in dealing with a traumatic situation and I appreciated her candor as she shared her thoughts.

I found myself rendered inarticulate at some of her recollections. The thought of her having the wherewithal to hunt for her purse so that no one would find her identification and wonder about her fate, still moves me.

I didn't know what to say. It didn't help that part of me was engrossed in recording her words as accurately as possible.

There's been a lot of media introspection in the weeks following Princess Diana's untimely death. How intrusive do we have a right to be? Do we sensationalize stories?

Sherri Wise

Do we cross boundaries we shouldn't? How do we balance the public's right to know with an interview subject's right to privacy?

Readers have every right to expect accurate, balanced, sensitive reporting. Reporters have an obligation to be accountable. In the last few weeks, we've been held to a higher standard, not an unfamiliar one at The CJN, but one that bears repeating.

Rabbi Naftoli Friedler

Yeshiva leader dies

VAUGHAN — An overflow crowd at Ner Israel Yeshiva paid tribute to Rabbi Naftoli Friedler who died recently at age 76.

Rabbi Friedler, author of two books on the Talmud as well as others which are being prepared for publication, was rosh yeshivah at Ner Israel from 1971 to 1988.

He spent 25 years as rosh yeshivah of the Rav Samson Raphael Hirsch School (Breuer's) in New York, before coming to Ner Israel.

Rabbi Gavriel Ginsberg, current rosh yeshivah at Ner Israel, said that learning and "disseminating Torah was [Rabbi Friedler's] sole purpose in life."

Guest speaker, Dr. Shea Werzberger, a pediatrician in New York, said that Rabbi Friedler was his mentor, first at Ner Israel and more recently in Monsey, where he attended Rabbi Friedler's daily lectures for nine years.

Rabbi Uri Mayerfeld, a lecturer at Ner Israel and son-in-law to Rabbi Friedler spoke of his father-in-law's "unflinching quest for truth."

Rabbi Friedler leaves his wife Judith, eight children, as well as his grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Shaping the Future

The sun was shining and there was a sense of excitement and anticipation at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care on the morning of August 28, 1997.

Over three hundred Baycrest donors, dignitaries, residents and staff attended the special groundbreaking ceremony for the new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders.

The Baycrest Campaign raised $60 million over its two years and we owe it all to you, our wonderful donors and supporters!

The Campaign was a success, but your support remains vitally important to meet the needs of our growing seniors population.

Kolel offers holiday program for unaffiliated community

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning has created a unique learning experience to introduce unaffiliated members of the community to liberal, egalitarian prayer.

Kolel director Rabbi Elyse Goldstein and Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz, the newly hired assistant director, will be co-leading participatory educational services, which will be held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) during the upcoming High Holidays.

Music on the second day of Rosh Hashanah and the afternoon of Yom Kippur will be provided by children's entertainers, Judy and David.

The Neila service will include a communal vegetarian meal to break the fast. Full day-care services with Judaic activities will also be available .

Rabbi Goldstein told The CJN in a recent interview that she was "really excited" to be offering this educational liberal High Holiday service, a first for the Reform movement. The service has "the blessings of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ)."

Endorsed by CCRJ

This High Holiday service format — it falls within Kolel's mandate to provide liberal education programs as well as outreach to unaffiliated Jews — underscores Kolel's role as a trail-blazer within the Reform movement, she said.

"We don't know of anyone in any other Reform community in North America that has High Holiday services that are specifically educational and specifically outreach. We feel proud to be in the forefront."

The centre was the first liberal Jewish educational centre to be established in North America, she said. "Six years ago it was revolutionary for the Reform movement to have an outreach institution" geared to "Jews who are just entering or re-entering Jewish life."

According to Rabbi Goldstein the impetus for the special High Holiday services came from Kolel's program advisory committee, made up of its students, who for years had requested this kind of educational service. She was unable to comply until Rabbi Schwartz joined Kolel's staff, she said. "Having a second rabbi made it possible to take on this kind of project."

It was "really important" that the CCRJ has publicly endorsed the services, she said. "[The Reform rabbis] see it as an entrance point into the liberal Jewish world and then perhaps on to a synagogue and greater communal involvement."

In fact, the purchase price of the ticket, which is tax deductible, can be applied as credit toward annual membership fees for most of the Reform congregations in the Greater Toronto Area, she added.

Many of Kolel's students, are in the midst of studying as they will be reading Torah and Haftorah portions at the services; Rabbi Goldstein made 22 tapes for those participants who need audio assistance to learn to chant their Torah portions, she said.

"It took the entire month of August to help [with the planning]. That's my role as the rosh yeshivah. My job is to teach. I saw that as a part of teaching."

She noted that many people involved in the service are unaffiliated and "felt very honored to be invited to take leadership roles...In larger congregations they would not have the same opportunity for leadership."

The service, which Rabbi Goldstein called "eclectic," will incorporate traditional liturgy as well as creative readings and meditations; and offer text study, explanations and explorations into the history and structure of prayers, melodies and Torah portions, she said.

Sales of the tickets have been brisk Rabbi Goldstein said. "It was a heartening response...We didn't know how people would respond. Everyday we are calling the chair company to add another 100 chairs to our order."

To reserve tickets call the Kolel office at 905-764-1329. Tickets can also be purchased at the BJC on Sept. 28 10 a.m to 8 p.m and Sept. 29 and 30 5 to 8 p.m. The Zuckerman Charitable foundation has made a limited number of pay-what-you-can seats available to those who cannot afford the full price.

CJC helps make Israel a reality for teens

TORONTO — Many of the 23 Jewish teenagers from Ontario small communities cried at the Kotel, on their final night together in Israel.

It was "not only because we were going to miss each other, but because we had become attached to the country itself, its spirit and spirituality," said Leanne Rosen, coordinator of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region's High School Outreach Program.

"They had become closer and more unified, not only as a group of youngsters sharing similar experiences living in smaller centres, but unified Jewishly," said Rosen after the youngsters returned home following a five-week summer study tour of Israel. The trip was the culmination of a three-year educational program under the auspices of CJC's small communities and youth activities department.

Jennifer Turack, the department's director who also accompanied the group to Israel, said, "It was wonderful to see how they absorbed the flavor and history of the country, and embraced their heritage."

The Canada-Israel Experience Centre organized the itinerary and provided support services for the tour. UIA Canada provided some financial support.

"Everyone goes to Israel with certain expectations," said Rosen who was making her first trip there. "What amazed me was that not only were all of my expectations met, but in most cases, my experiences were better than I ever could have dreamed or imagined."

Leah Kilberg, 15, of Guelph said that she was "overwhelmed" by the visit to Israel. "Usually when you go away, you get homesick after a while. But in Israel, it was like going home. I hope to move there one day."

Stephen Weir, 15, of Timmins also did not expect "Israel and Israelis to be a lot like Canada and Canadians in so many ways, despite its ancient culture and history."

As part of a pre-Sabbath program in Jerusalem, the group went to Machane Yehuda market." It was like nothing I ever experienced before with its hustle and bustle, variety of food and people," said Rosen.

When the group returned to Jerusalem during its final week in Israel, Kilberg said that they "found it very hard to be restricted. We understood the need for precautions [after the bombing], but we saw from our windows Israelis going about their every day life."

A positive experience for the Ontario teenagers was the five days spent on an army base in Sde Boker learning about the IDF.

Jewish Campus Services gets new staffers

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two of the newest staffers at Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, Stephanie Wener, 22, and Barbara Friedman 25, are delighted to be working at jobs they love.

The two women are part of Hillel International's Jewish Campus Service Corps, which sponsors 77 one-year fellowships across North America.

Wener, a new graduate of McGill University with a BA in Psychology, divides her time between the University of Toronto, where she is an "engagement" worker (a position formerly known as outreach worker) and Ryerson Polytechnic University, where she is Hillel program coordinator.

Friedman, who was born in New Jersey and raised in Toronto, is based at York University, where she earned a combined BA/BEd. Her portfolio includes engagement work, UJA on Campus and liaison with UJA Federation's York Region office.

Ironically, neither Wener nor Friedman was involved in Jewish campus life as a student. Wener, a native of Montreal, did attend a Hillel coffee house once. "It was nice. I had a good time, but no one approached me. I probably would have been a very easy recruit."

As a student, Friedman found the Jewish Student Federation (JSF) "cliquish. No one approached me.

Stephanie Wener

I could have been the prime student [to become involved]."

Of course, she added, the JSF was different then.

The fellows were both youth advisers in university – Wener for B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) – where she also served as a chapter president and a regional vice-president. Friedman for United Synagogue Youth at Shaar Shalom Synagogue. She now works part-time at Beth Tikvah Synagogue as youth coordinator.

After moving to Toronto following her graduation last April, Wener sought work in the Jewish community here. "Even as a B'nai Brith [Youth] member, I loved the work.

At U of T, Wener is focusing on outreach to graduate students and resident students. She is especially familiar with concerns of the latter group, "being away from home and trying to orient myself to the city," and has an affinity with the former, many of whom, like her, recently completed an undergraduate degree.

At Ryerson, she replaces Tami Sitcoff, who also had responsibility for Seneca Hillel. (Rabbi Michael Skobac of JCS is now the Seneca Hillel staffer.)

Although Wener does engagement work at Ryerson, much of her work there involves raising awareness of Hillel.

While Ryerson supposedly has the fifth-largest Jewish student population in Canada, with an estimated 1,200 Jewish students, its Jewish population is decidedly low-profile. Their facilities consist only of a broom closet-sized shared office and a room rented for a weekly open house. Their mailing list has 200 names, with more anticipated as the year progresses.

Upcoming events include building an on-campus sukkah. Earlier this week, Steve Paikin of TVOntario was scheduled to speak on Journalism and Judaism.

For Friedman, who returned this summer from a year in Israel where she took part in the World Union of Jewish Students program in Arad and took a teacher training course in Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem, a conversation at York last week reinforced what the fellowship is all about.

An Israeli student told Friedman she hadn't met any other Israelis at York.

"I said, 'You've got to be kidding me. There's tons of Israelis here. Let's plan something, maybe a social evening, for Israelis.'

"Now," Friedman told The CJN, "not only will she have a community, we have someone who's involved. It's great. It's the perfect job. I love it."

Former CJN intern Simone Joseph, seated, and reporter Frances Kraft talk to Ryerson students about the paper at a Jewish Campus Services partners' fair last week. [Ron Csillag photo]

FOOD IDEAS FOR

Rosh Hashanah

Holiday dishes can be fast and easy

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The holidays are fast approaching. Those of us who do the plans for all the meals are starting to get into panic mode. Rosh Hashanah is just over the horizon and even though it's "late" this year, it doesn't mean that we actually have any more time than any other year to get ready. No matter how much time we think we have, it's never enough.

I for one haven't begun to plan, invite, shop, or even clean the house. If your days are like mine, you'll think you have enough time to prepare fabulous meals but end up driving yourself nuts and vowing not to do the same thing next year (we never learn). So, with this thought in mind, I decided that for the main dishes this Rosh Hashanah (and the Shabbat that immediately follows) I would make dishes that are easy and fast.

Yes, I said easy and fast. They will also be so delicious that everyone will rave. Best of all you'll be able to prepare these dishes ahead of time. What more could you ask for? Oh, you're asking for low fat and different? OK, we can do that too by sticking with chicken and turkey.

CHICKEN WITH CARAMELIZED ONION AND GARLIC

4 bone-in split chicken breasts, skin removed
1 tbsp. olive oil
2 medium onions, sliced
6 cloves garlic, minced
1/3 cup brown sugar
2 tbsp. kosher white wine vinegar

Rinse chicken with cold water and pat dry with paper towels. Preheat oven to 450. Spray 12 x 8-inch baking dish with nonstick cooking spray. Heat oil in medium nonstick skillet over medium-low heat. Add onion and garlic, mix well. Cook and stir 6 to 8 minutes or until soft. Stir in sugar and vinegar until dissolved. Cook and stir 7 to 9 minutes or until liquid evaporates. Remove from heat.

Place chicken, bone side down, in baking dish. Spread onion mixture evenly over chicken. Cover loosely with foil. Bake for 25 minutes or until chicken is done.

This recipe can be doubled or tripled. Serves 4. This can be cooked for 20 minutes and then reheated for 15 minutes at 375 and then served.

ORANGE PINEAPPLE CHICKEN STIR-FRY

4 boneless skinless chicken breasts
1 clove garlic, minced
1 medium onion, sliced in rings
1 pkg. (6 oz.) frozen snow pea pods
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1/2 tsp. ginger
1 can (14 oz.) pineapple tidbits in juice, drained
2 tbsp. cornstarch
1/2 cup chicken broth, divided
1 can (11 oz.) mandarin orange slices, drained

Rinse chicken with cold water and pat dry with paper towels. Cut into thin slices. Preheat heavy fry pan (or wok) about 3 minutes over medium-high heat, spray with nonstick spray. Add chicken breast strips and minced garlic and stir-fry about 3 minutes.

Increase heat to high and add onion and snow pea pods, stir-frying about 3 minutes. Add salt, pepper, ginger and pineapple, continuing to stir-fry about 3 minutes more. (If you're preparing this ahead of time stop at this point and refrigerate the chicken and vegetables. Just before you want to serve continue by putting the chicken and vegetables into a skillet.)

In small bowl, mix cornstarch with 2 tablespoons of the chicken broth, stirring until smooth. Slowly add remaining broth, stirring constantly. Add broth to mixture in fry pan, stirring gently to mix evenly. Add mandarin oranges and heat only until hot through, about 2 minutes, stirring gently to keep orange sections from breaking. Makes 4 servings.

This can be doubled or tripled. Sprinkle with rice noodles, chow mein noodles or fried flat noodles if you like.

BAKED CHICKEN WITH CIDER AND APPLES

2 chickens (2 1/2 to 3 lbs. each) quartered
2 cups apple cider
1 cup flour
1 tbsp. ground ginger
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
Salt and freshly ground black pepper, to taste
3 tbsp. brown sugar
1/3 cup apple liquor
2 apples, cored and cut into thin wedges

One day before preparing, place the chicken pieces in a shallow dish. Pour the cider over the chicken and marinate overnight in the refrigerator, turning the pieces occasionally (sometimes I only have time to marinate for a couple of hours and that's OK).

When ready to cook, preheat the oven to 350. Remove the chicken from the cider but reserve the cider. In a large bowl, mix the flour, ginger, cinnamon, and salt and pepper to taste. Dredge the chicken with the flour mixture and place skin side up in a shallow baking pan. Bake the chicken, uncovered for 30 minutes.

Meanwhile combine the reserved cider, the brown sugar, apple liquor, and apple slices in a bowl. Add the remaining marinade and then pour the mixture over the chicken and bake 25 minutes more, basting occasionally with the pan juices. Serves 8.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Cookbook helps tackle the last minute rush

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

You know the drill. You make plans to prepare everything for the holy days long in advance. Lists detail how you will make a kugel a night for three nights, make double of your chicken recipes and make at least one pastry recipe every other day.

At the same time, because you are only making one or two extra things every day, you will still give your family tasty, nutritious meals.

Then reality hits. You find yourself making three kugels on Monday night, two cakes and a chicken dish on Tuesday, and stuffing the kids with more pizza than even they can tolerate.

Fortunately, a new cookbook has appeared that can help – Monda Rosenberg's Quickies: ten quick ways with everyday foods (Chatelaine Food Express, McClelland & Stewart, 1997).

Not only is it full of quick, easy recipes, made of ingredients that you probably have in your cupboard, but the techniques are mostly just one or two steps. There is considerable use of the microwave, which means dinner is on the table before your husband has finished the bag of potato chips.

The book is arranged alphabetically by main ingredient (apples, bananas, cranberries, noodles, olives, pumpkin, rice, sweet potatoes, tofu, zucchini). Many sections start with a page of quick suggestions. "Burgers," for instance starts with recipes for the ultimate BBQ Burger, sassy salsa burger and oriental sesame burger, followed by a page of toppings – onion and garlic; tex-mex, a mixture of barbecue sauce and salsa; and Spanish sauce, made with chili or salsa, olives, Spanish onion and crushed garlic.

That is not to say that you won't find quick ideas for Rosh Hashanah. What could be wrong with Harvard beets, lemon tarragon rice or chicken breasts with sage and peaches? Or a salad made with peaches, walnuts and lettuce, tossed with a mayonnaise and orange juice dressing?

HARVARD BEETS

In a saucepan, stir 1/4 cup brown sugar, with 1 tbsp. cornstarch, 1/4 tsp. dry mustard, 1/4 tsp. salt and generous pinches of ginger and pepper.

Stir in 2 tbsp. lemon juice or vinegar and 1½ cups diced cooked or canned beets.

Stir over medium heat until thick, about 3 min. Continue stirring often for five more minutes. Serves 4.

CURRIED ONIONS AND POTATOES

In a 10-cup casserole dish, stir 2 tbsp. melted butter with 2 tbsp. hot water, 1 tbsp. curry powder and pinches of garlic powder and pepper.

Stir in 6 small halved onions and 6 small quartered potatoes.

Cover, bake at 350 for 45 minutes. Stir occasionally.

Stir in 1 cup sour cream. Great with fish. Serves 4.

MICROWAVE BERRY RHUBARB CRISP

Place 3 cups chopped rhubarb in an 8-cup microwave-safe dish with 425gram package thawed frozen strawberries and juice.

Blend 1/4 cup sugar with 2 tsp. cornstarch. Stir into fruit.

Microwave, covered, on high, 5 min. Stir well.

Combine 1/4 cup chilled butter or pareve margarine with 1/4 cup brown sugar, 1/3 cup rolled oats, 1/3 cup all-purpose flour and 1½ tsp. cinnamon until crumbly. Sprinkle over fruit.

Microwave, uncovered, on medium, 10 min. Let stand, 5 min. Serves 6.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

'People-friendly' cookbook offers helpful tips

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Some of my favorite cookbooks are produced by women's organizations, auxiliaries, or charities. Not only do they tend to have recipes that are, for want of a better word, "people friendly," in both taste and preparation, but they give an insight into the mindset of those a lot like you or me – only divided by distance.

Check out Beyond Chicken Soup: a collection of contemporary and traditional food favorites, prepared by the Jewish Home Auxiliary in Rochester New York. It is one of the best to appear in recent years.

While you will certainly find here the old favorites, like lentil barley soup, tzimmes, compote, roast brisket and poppy seed cake, you will also find chicken cooked with eggplant or with artichokes and mushrooms, lemon layered Alaska pie, tomato risotto and ratatouille pie.

All recipes indicate whether they are meat, dairy or pareve, although many are easily converted. Preparation and cooking times are noted, as are the proper size of pot, storage information and special notes.

The index is excellent, a characteristic that is not always present in cookbooks such as this.

Beyond Chicken Soup is available at Jewish book stores.

CURRIED CHICKEN SOUP WITH SPROUTS

4 tbsp. pareve margarine
1 onion, chopped
1 cup celery, with leaves, thinly sliced
1 apple, peeled, cored and chopped
1/4 cup flour
4 cups chicken broth
1/2 tsp. curry powder
2 cups cooked chicken, diced
1 cup bean sprouts
salt and pepper to taste

Melt margarine. Saute onion, celery and apple for five minutes, or until tender. Stir in flour. Gradually stir in broth and curry powder. Bring to a boil.

Add chicken and sprouts. Reduce heat, simmer 5 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Serves 6

GLAZED CARROTS AND APPLES

4 tbsp. margarine
2 tbsp. water
1 1/2 cups baby carrots, cut in half lengthwise
1 1/2 cups pared and thinly sliced apples
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. nutmeg
1/8 tsp. dried marjoram

Melt margarine in skillet. Add water and carrots. Cover and cook over low heat for 20 min. Add apples and sprinkle with brown sugar, salt, nutmeg and marjoram. Cover and cook until apples are tender, approximately 5 min. Serves 4.

'90s CARROT-APRICOT CAKE

3 cups flour
2 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground mace
1/4 tsp. ground allspice
1 cup sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup oil
1 cup applesauce
5 egg whites
1 tsp. vanilla
3 cups shredded carrots
1 cup raisins
1 cup chopped walnuts
1 cup chopped dried apricots

In a large bowl, sift flour together with baking soda, baking powder, cinnamon, mace, allspice, sugar and salt.

In a medium bowl, mix oil, applesauce, egg whites and vanilla. Add carrots, raisins, walnuts and apricots. Blend well and add to flour mixture.

Pour batter into lightly greased 10 x 3 1/2 inch Bunt pan. Bake until a toothpick inserted in the centre of the cake comes out clean, about 1 1/2 hrs. Serves 12 to 16.

This next recipe is great for the busy cook – simply make it in the evening and take it out of the oven the next morning:

FORGOTTEN COOKIES

2 egg whites
1/4 cup sugar
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
1 cup chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 350.

Beat egg whites and sugar until shiny. Stir in chocolate chips and pecans. Drop about 2 tsp. of batter for each cookie onto greased cookie sheets, approximately 1 inch apart. Place in oven. TURN OVEN OFF. Do not open for 8 hours. Store in covered container. Makes 36 cookies.

CHICKEN ROLL UPS

2 boneless skinless chicken breasts, split in half
1/2 lb. pastrami
2 cups seasoned bread crumbs
1 cup mayonnaise (low fat)
1 cup ketchup
2 tsp. grated horseradish
1 jar duck sauce

Preheat oven to 350. Wash the chicken and dry. In a bowl combine the mayonnaise, ketchup and horseradish. Mix well and then dip the cutlets in the mixture and coat it. Pour the bread crumbs onto a plate and then roll the coated chicken pieces in the bread crumbs, both sides.

Lay the cutlet down flat. Place a piece or two of pastrami on the cutlet and then roll it up. Secure with a toothpick. Place seam side down in a greased 9 x 13 baking dish. Cover all rolled cutlets with duck sauce. Bake for 35 minutes. Serves 4.

This can be doubled or tripled. It can be prepared and baked for 25 minutes and then refrigerated until ready to prepare. To serve, cook an additional 15 to 20 minutes.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Creating vegetarian, dairy-free holiday menus

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There is a saying that when things get tough, the tough get going. Francine Teller, a former critical care nurse, must be very tough indeed.

When she faced difficulties in her private and professional lives, she didn't succumb to despair; she decided to open her own business, Just Eat It, catering low fat, vegetarian, dairy-free menus.

The idea came to her, she says, because she realized that she herself had to eat a more healthy diet. As a nurse, "I knew what I should eat."

Her diet, heavy on beans, vegetables and grains, not only helps those with illnesses and food allergies and sensitivities, but, she says, helps people deal with stress as well.

"You feel more energized, more able to think clearly," she says.

As well, legumes, especially soy and broccoli, have been proven to lower the risk of colon cancer, and improve the immune system.

While she does not use organically grown fruits and vegetables, except by special request, all produce is washed in filtered water and a solution of three per cent hydrogen peroxide to remove all traces of pesticides.

She does not use curries or other exotic spices, but sticks to fresh "North American style" herbs, such as onions and garlic.

Teller is careful to point out that while the food is prepared in her own strictly kosher kitchen, she is not under kashruth supervision.

She offers her clients two weeks worth of menus at a time. Customers must order by Thursday for delivery the following Monday afternoon. All shopping, cooking and cleaning up are done on Friday, after Shabbat and on Sundays.

"Sometimes we are even finishing a dish on Monday morning," she says with a sigh.

Teller shares a few of her meichels with The CJN readers:

PASTA WITH WILD MUSHROOM RAGOUT

1 tbsp. organic cold pressed olive oil
1 each medium yellow onion, red pepper and yellow pepper, diced in half inch dice
1 tbsp. minced garlic
4 portabella mushrooms, destemmed, gills scraped off and sliced into 1/4 inch slices, or 1 lb. shitake mushrooms or other mushrooms
1/2 tsp. cayenne pepper
2 bay leaves
1 tbsp. oregano leaves
1 bunch fresh basil, chopped
3/4 cup sundried tomatoes, chopped coarse
4 vine ripe tomatoes, diced
1 can organic tomato puree
12 oz. pkg. whole wheat rotini or other pasta favorites
2 qts. distilled water or pure water

Heat olive oil. Add onions, peppers, and garlic and saute. Add mushrooms, cayenne and herbs. Continue to simmer until tender. Add tomato products and simmer 30-45 min. to incorporate all the flavors.

Bring water to a boil. Add pasta and cook 6-8 min., or until al dente. Strain pasta and serve with mushroom ragout. Serves 4.

For an added touch, sprinkle pasta with soy parmesan cheese.

OVEN FRIED SWEET POTATO SPEARS

4 medium sweet potatoes, unpeeled
1/4 cup organic cold pressed olive oil
1 tsp. minced garlic
2 tsp. fresh chopped thyme and rosemary
2 tsp. fresh chopped basil or oregano

Preheat oven to 425.

Scrub sweet potatoes under cold running water. Cut in half lengthwise, then cut in wedges 3/4 in. thick.

Whip together olive oil and herb mixture in a blender or in a bowl.

Toss oil mixture with sweet potatoes. Reserve remaining oil, and place potatoes on a sheet pan. Bake for 45 minutes to an hour on the top rack or until tender and a little charred. Serves 4.

For a more carmelized flavor, bake longer, being careful not to burn.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Variety of new wines available for holiday

Jewish tradition decrees that, during the High Holy Days, we bestow upon one another the blessings for a healthy and prosperous New Year. Along with the synagogue service, the season includes the festive meals that begin with Rosh Hashanah and continue through the Sukkot holidays.

Every cuisine tells a story. The varied Jewish holiday recipes reflect the homelands and culture of the past. The Ashkenazi custom of stuffed cabbage, freshwater fish and chicken prevails in many homes of Russian and eastern European origin. Lamb, eggplant, saltwater fish and olive oil endures in Moroccan and Sephardi cooking.

All holiday meals share the traditional partner to food, good wine. We wish a l'chaim for the new year and celebrate with the finest wines available. It's interesting to note that in the French language, the word "chai" translates to mean the barrel-aging facility. In the Bordeaux region of France, virtually all red wines are kept in "chais" where they are stored and aged. In Hebrew, chai means life.

New for the holidays are award-winning kosher wines that are produced and distributed by the Royal Wine Corporation, which is owned and operated by the Herzog family. The Herzogs have built up an enterprise that spans eight generations. This kosher wine-making dynasty traces its roots to Czechoslovakia. Their first winery was started 150 years ago and having survived the Nazi occupation, relocated in New York in 1948. Today, their wines are renown throughout the world. The following are examples of three favorites available in Canada.

A must for your holiday beef, veal or lamb dishes is the Herzog Special Reserve, Alexander Valley Cabernet Sauvignon 1994. This "unfiltered" red wine was grown in a unique microclimate, allowing the grapes to ripen evenly due to a balance of crop, canopy and exposure. To enhance and elevate the nuances of the wine, it was aged entirely in new barrels for 12 months. This wine is mevushal and consistently wins medals in competition against non-kosher wines. This is truly a great wine.

Also new this year is the first kosher State of Oregon product. The Weinstock Cellars' Pinot Noir was made from Pinot noir grapes grown in the Sweet Cheeks Vineyard of Oregon's famous Willamette Valley – an area known for growing some of the finest Pinot noir grapes. This wine exudes aromas of violet, berry and spice. It will accompany saucy veal and chicken entrees.

And finally, this year is the Baron Herzog Clarksburg Chenin Blanc 1996. This semi-dry, grassy white wine is a perennial gold medal winner. It is intensely fruity, exhibiting aromas of peaches and nectarines. Enjoy it chilled with poultry dishes. It has been described as "The Chenin of the decade."

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Some holiday recipes available from COR

Every year, the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR) issues recipes for different holidays – and this high holy day season is no different.

COR reminds you that eruv tavshilin, the rite that allows you to cook on Friday yom tov for the Shabbat, is performed erev Rosh Hashanah (Oct. 1), erev Sukkot (Oct. 15) and erev Shemini Atzeret (Oct. 22).

Here is a sample of this year's recipes. For the whole menu, call the Kosher Information Service, 635-9550.

MARINATED HONEY CHICKEN SUPREME

1 3-4 lb. chicken, in eighths
Marinade:
½ cup honey
½ cup pineapple or orange juice
1 cup ketchup or chili sauce
1 tbsp. soy sauce
2 garlic cloves, crushed

Clean and dry chicken pieces. Mix marinade ingredients together. Pour over chicken. Refrigerate overnight.

Preheat oven to 400. Bake uncovered 1 hr., basting frequently. Serve with couscous, rice or noodles. Serves 4 to 6.

COLORFUL MARINATED VEGETABLES

3 carrots, thinly sliced
3 small zucchini, sliced
½ lb. snow peas, trimmed
1 red pepper, thinly sliced in rings
Marinade:
3 tbsp. kosher balsamic vinegar, or 1½ tbsp. white vinegar and 1½ tbsp. semi dry kosher wine
¼ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup extra virgin olive oil
1 tsp. basil, crushed
1 tsp. finely grated lemon rind
2 tbsp. honey
freshly ground black pepper

Place all vegetables in a glass bowl.

Place all marinade ingredients in a jar and shake well to combine or process in blender or food processor. Pour over veggies, toss to coat. Cover and refrigerate for at least one hour. Serves 6.

QUICK, EASY TOMATO SOUP

1 med. onion, finely chopped
1 clove garlic, crushed
1 tbsp. oil
1 28-oz. can plum tomatoes
1½ cups tomato juice
1 tsp. Worcestershire sauce
¼ cup semi-dry kosher wine
3 tbsp. tomato paste
1 tsp. thyme
1 tsp. basil
¼ tsp. dried dillweed
1 tbsp. sugar
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. pepper

In a large saucepan, saute the onion and garlic until transparent. Add remaining ingredients and simmer for half an hour. Garnish with chopped, flat parsley.

For dairy, replace tomato juice with milk or light cream, being careful not to bring to a boil. Serves 6 to 8.

Since Worcestershire sauce contains fish, this soup should not be served with meat.

Food Ideas for Rosh Hashanah

Natural food recipes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Twenty-eight years ago, Edith Rothschild suffered from crippling arthritis. That is when she decided to "turn my back on medicine and take charge of my own health."

Since then, after much research and reading, she has eaten only foods that are natural and wholesome. She has also spent her time showing others, both formally and informally, that food that is healthy can also be tasty and elegant.

Rothschild comes by her interest in natural food honestly. In the 1920s, her mother, was interested in nutrition and often went to lectures on the subject.

"She used to give me muesli and raw oatmeal," the petite, fit-looking Rothschild told The CJN in a recent interview.

Healthy, not boring

Her children don't follow her eating path and her husband – businessman, communal activist and philanthropist Kurt Rothschild – "doesn't have a whole lot of choice," she says with a laugh, but her grandchildren "love my stuff."

Even yom tov recipes don't have to be boring, just because they are healthy. "There is no logical connection between chicken soup and Rosh Hashanah," she said wryly.

Her table is loaded with delicious, elegant offerings like stuffed tomatoes, zucchini boats, creamed soups, quiches, vegetables, salads and great desserts, even if they are low fat, low cholesterol, and sugar-free.

You don't leave the table bloated, she noted.

Agreeing that cooking her way, using a lot of vegetables, beans and rice, takes a lot more time than conventional cooking, she said "you have to be organized and plan ahead. Make lists."

For instance, she said, you can soak beans on Sunday for Monday's supper, and cook a whole bunch of rice at once and put it in baggies in the refrigerator or freezer.

Other suggestions were to get the children to help and use your cleaning help, if you have any, "to prepare vegetables instead of dusting behind the pictures."

She is in the beginning stages of writing a cookbook, with the working title Cooking for Wellness and Beyond. Recipes will be low fat, low cholesterol, high quality, natural, kosher, tasty and simple to prepare, she said, joking that her motto for it is "the 8 Fs – fast food for fun and frantic days for frazzled folk."

Here are a few of her recipes perfect for Rosh Hashanah.

YAM CRANBERRY CASSEROLE

4 medium yams, peeled
¼ tsp. sea salt
2 cups fresh cranberries, or one package frozen
1 orange, peeled and chopped fine
1 tsp. orange zest
½ cup pure maple syrup
½ cup water
1 tbsp. arrowroot powder
½ cup pecans or walnuts, chopped (optional)

Preheat oven to 350.

Steam or boil yams until soft.

Meanwhile, prepare cranberry sauce. In a saucepan, combine cranberries, orange pieces and water, and cook on medium heat for about 10 min., or until all cranberries have popped. Add maple syrup and simmer another 5 min., stirring occasionally.

Dissolve arrowroot in 1½-2 tbsp. cold water to form a paste and add to hot cranberry mixture. Bring to the boil, while stirring vigorously until mixture is thickened. Remove from heat and cool.

In a medium bowl, mash the yams, preferably (while still warm) with the salt and orange zest. In an oiled oven-proof serving dish, place half the mashed yams. Cover with a layer of half the cranberry sauce. Add remaining yam mixture, and top with the remaining cranberry sauce. Sprinkle with nuts and bake uncovered in a 350 preheated oven for 25-30 min. Serves 8 or more.

This casserole can be prepared in advance and baked when needed, or finished and reheated covered. It can also be frozen.

PINEAPPLE STRAWBERRY MOUSSE

1 sweet pineapple, peeled and cored
2 tbsp. pure maple syrup
½ cup pecans or cashews, roasted and chopped, or a mix of both.
1 pkg. frozen strawberries

Remove strawberries from package and place in a bowl to defrost (do not defrost in the package). Roast the nuts in the oven (275 degrees) or in a skillet on the stove until they give off that special aroma. Be careful not to burn them.

Slice pineapple into 1-inch rings and cut each ring into 1-inch chunks. Place pineapple into food processor and use the knife blade with a pulsing action until the pineapple forms a mousse. Do not over-process. Remove mousse from processor and strain through a sieve. Place drained mousse into a bowl. Reserve liquid for another use.

Process strawberries in the processor with the maple syrup until pureed.

Fill ⅓ of crystal stemmed glasses with pineapple mousse, then sprinkle lightly with a layer of chopped nuts and cover with a layer of strawberry sauce. Repeat layering until glasses are full, ending with strawberry sauce.

Human rights advocate Matas among NCJW honorees

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Asking a government to protect human rights is "like leaving violators to police themselves," says human rights advocate David Matas.

"While governments everywhere accept human rights, their performances tell a different story. Since the end of World War II, we have seen a revolution in human rights worldwide," Matas says. "But human rights advocates have to remain volunteers and ever vigilant."

The internationally known advocate for refugees, and for the prosecution of Nazi war criminals in Canada, made his comments in accepting a Centennial Community Award from the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Winnipeg section.

He was one of five Winnipeg recipients of Centennial Awards presented by National Council branches across Canada in celebration of the organization's 100th anniversary.

The presentations here were made at the Winnipeg section's annual meeting and installation of officers and board earlier this month at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

Other award winners were Naomi Coodin, a teacher at the Simkim Early Years School, and Stav Gamliel, a third-year education student at the University of Winnipeg, who received two of three Irene Samuel Scholarships the NCJW awarded this year across Canada; Glenna Kay the new co-president of the Winnipeg section, who was presented with the National Centennial Award for Young Leadership; and Bunny Gurvey, presented with a Centennial Member Award.

Gurvey praised the National Centennial Member Award winner, longtime honorary president Lucille Lorie of Toronto, as the "consummate NCJW person."

In Winnipeg, however, Gurvey is known as "Mrs. National Council." Her long time involvement with NCJW has included spearheading the creation and distribution around the world of a manual on women's health issues; presenting a brief on pensions for women, to the federal government on behalf of NCJW Canada; and being part of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations Women's Conference in Nairobi, Kenya.

Last April, she was the recipient of the Premier's Volunteer Service Award.

Outgoing National President Sharon Wolchock praised outgoing Winnipeg section president Sharon Allentuck for the growth and achievements of the Winnipeg section over the last two years under her leadership. "You set the highest standards," Wolchock said.

Pfeffer noted that in December, NCJW Winnipeg Section will be kicking off the centennial celebrations with an archival display in the new Jewish Museum of Western Canada.

The new co-presidents are Glenna Kay and Shelley Pfeffer.

Some say everything is OK in the Former Soviet Union.

Of course, they don't go to bed hungry.

Communism may have disappeared in Russia and surrounding states, but hunger remains. More than 200,000 elderly Jews in the Former Soviet Union are desperate for food, medicine or home services. 14-year-old Gena Goldman delivers bare essentials to just a few of the 70,000 we can afford to feed through the Joint Distribution Committee. Students, survivors hold vigil

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Vladimir Katriuk was not home.

But the absence of the 75-year-old beekeeper mattered little to the 50 students and Holocaust survivors who held a vigil last week outside his residence in the east-end Rosemount section of Montreal.

Katriuk is a suspected Nazi war criminal whom the Canadian government is trying to strip of citizenship for allegedly lying about his wartime activities in the Waffen SS in order to enter Canada.

On the quiet, tree-lined street, curious neighbors looked on as speakers standing directly in front of Katriuk's 38th Ave. triplex harshly criticized the Canadian government for doing so little to pursue Nazi war criminals who found safe haven in Canada over the last five decades.

"We are here as a presence and as a moral statement, to focus our attention on the Canadian government" said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, spiritual leader of the Beth Israel Beth Aaron synagogue and a Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) officer.

'We stand as silent witnesses'

"The government has been nearly criminally negligent in enforcing justice in Canada."

Rabbi Poupko noted that the alleged Nazi past of Katriuk, who moved to Canada from France in 1951 and reportedly spends most of his time tending to his beehives in Ormstown, has been known to the Canadian government since 1986, when his name was given to the Deschenes Commission investigating the presence of alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada. The RCMP had even interviewed Katriuk about his past as early as 1984.

"But it has taken until 1997 to move in a meaningful way," Rabbi Poupko said.

"Today, we stand as silent witnesses, as relatives and families of the victims."

According to court documents, Romanian-born Katriuk, who will go on trial in December at the first such proceedings to be held in Montreal, is accused of lying about his position as a voluntary SS death-squad leader in the notorious Schutzmannschaft in 1942 and 1943.

The squad has been held responsible for the slaughter of thousands of Jews and in Belarus and Ukraine.

Katriuk is also accused of using a false name – Nicolas Schpirka – in his application to come to Canada.

The vigil, organized by CJC and Hillel-Jewish Student Centre as part of a recent CJC impetus to be more proactive on the issue and to exert added pressure on the Canadian government, drew fewer numbers than planned for.

Rabbi Poupko told the crowd that the vigil – held on the 10th anniversary of the passing of Bill C-71, which allowed domestic prosecution of suspected war criminals – was "deliberately small" in order not to disrupt the neighborhood. But organizers had reserved three buses to transport as many as 120 people to Katriuk's home.

Still, the smaller numbers did not appear to diminish the depth of emotion conveyed by speakers or felt by participants.

Holocaust survivor Issie Veisfeld wanted to know why the Canadian government has "protected" Nazi war criminals – even "more than Argentina ever did."

Similarly, McGill University students Saritte Engel, 19, and Sig Shore, 18, could not fathom the Canadian record of being a "safe haven" for Nazi war criminals.

"Canada has been at the forefront for social justice," Engel told the crowd, "but for some reason, it has ignored this dire situation.

"As a Jew, I cannot believe I live in the same community as those with Jewish blood on their hands."

The vigil closed with Rabbi Poupko teaching a page from the Talmud to students to demonstrate that "that which they thought to destroy still lives," and with participants breaking into a spontaneous horah while singing, Am Yisrael Chai.

Meanwhile, Rabbi Poupko announced that another vigil would be staged at the Palais de Justice in December, as the proceedings against Katriuk begin.

"We will be there to make sure justice is done," he said.

The recent opening of "City of David," a new "Hebrew Christian" church at Steeles and Bathurst, has infuriated Toronto's Jewish Community. This church targets Jews for conversion and deceptively calls itself a "Synagogue."

Jews in Victoria strive to maintain identity

By SUZANNE KORT
Special to the Jewish Bulletin

VICTORIA — Whether affiliated with a congregation or not, being Jewish in Victoria takes special dedication and creativity.

While Congregation Emanu-El, the Conservative synagogue in downtown Victoria, is the only structure built for Jewish worship west of the Mainland, it is not the only place local Jews meet.

For the past four years across town at the Jewish Community Centre of Victoria (JCCV), the Society for Humanistic Judaism has gathered to discuss topics from the anthology, Judaism in a Secular Age, or Rabbi Sherwin Wine's, Judaism Beyond God.

Society founder and current President, Irv Margolese, says the society appeals to Jews who value their identity and are seeking unique ways to express it.

"We started off with seven families and grew over time," Margolese said. The 31 families now involved represent about 5 percent of Victoria's identified Jewish population, according to a 1996 demographic survey by the Jewish Federation of Victoria and Vancouver Island.

The society gathers on the first and third Saturday of each month. They celebrated their fifth Passover seder together at the centre this year.

In addition to the society's meetings, the JCCV has provided space for a bimonthly Orthodox minyan, Aish Hatorah, every other Saturday morning since March, 1996.

"We had to scratch to get enough people to come out of the woodwork for a minyan at the start," said current Aish Hatorah president Arnold Niederhoffer. "Now we can count regular people that want to show up at our minyan."

Niederhoffer gets calls from Vancouver and places farther east about their meetings. "Aish Hatorah [which is not affiliated with the international group by that name] adds a little extra character to Victoria and provides more activities for people who are Orthodox," he said.

In winter, Niederhoffer finds it challenging to transform the JCCV's deli into a shul before sundown. "The deli closes at 2:30 p.m. It's a short time span for set up," he said.

A Reform Congregation held services at the JCCV for the first time in May.

"We were surprised by the number of people (over 30) who came to the first service," said Sandy Fagan who moved to Victoria with her husband, Joel, from Calgary two years ago.

"The service is at a very preliminary stage," said Fagan. "Books had to be borrowed and returned to Temple Shalom in Vancouver. None of us have a background in leading a congregation. Some know songs, others know some Hebrew. We follow a participatory model."

Fagan was impressed with the ability of different groups to work together. "The JCCV was very welcoming to us and other groups about using the space," she said. "It speaks well for the centre's future."

The centre is located in an unassuming storefront on a busy suburban thoroughfare. In 1995, 82 households belonged, almost the same number as the synagogue (78), according to the Federation survey. More than half belong to both institutions. Besides the delicatessen (open September through June, 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. daily), the centre has a library, offices, and meeting rooms for programs ranging from video nights to a Yiddish speaking group.

Traditionally run by volunteers since it was initiated 10 years ago, the first paid staff member came on board in January. Program director, Janis Diner Brinley, ran Vancouver's Jewish Festival of the Arts and initiated the Vancouver Jewish Film Festival before taking on her new post in Victoria.

The disparities in the size and diversity of Vancouver and Victoria's Jewish population and community centres are incomparable, according to Diner Brinley. With no gym, theatre or child care facilities, she focuses on providing other kinds of opportunities for Jewish camaraderie, including bike trips, hiking, kayaking, and pottery workshops.

Diner Brinley said there are more opportunities for spontaneous involvement in a small Jewish community like Victoria. "Many things that I do Jewishly here I create myself," she said.

At a recent Passover seder, the Brinleys invited five intermarried couples who, until then, had very little time or inclination to celebrate Judaism.

Even so, they discovered that their offspring had unexpectedly caught Janis' creative spirit. After the children, seated at a separate table, had discussed their common "half and half" heritages, they disappeared, later re-emerging to present a dramatic rendition of the story of Moses.

Support of Israel still essential, Bonds group told

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Pleas to support Israel marked the recent State of Israel Bonds women's division luncheon at Adas Israel Synagogue.

Traditionally the first major fundraiser of the season, this year's luncheon in honor of Helen "Dolly" Cohen, a dedicated worker on behalf of virtually all major Jewish and Israeli causes, was "very successful," said Hamilton Bonds office manager, Barbara Balonjan.

Keynote speaker, Bess Myerson, told the over 200 guests that [Diasporah Jews] can play "a very constructive role in helping to shape and build the Israel of the 21st century.

"We are so few — we have always been so few — and that," she reminded her audience, "is why we must do so much."

Frequently referring to the Holocaust and the six million who perished, she said that "those who wish to understand why Israel is so important to us, must begin by understanding our long history."

Proud of having been not only the first Jewish Miss America but of being "the only" Jewish Miss America, Myerson said that she was there when Israel Bonds was initiated in 1951, and that she has "criss-crossed the country" on behalf of Bonds for 46 years.

First major fundraiser

With affectionate humor, she recalled her "tyrannical" mother, who only spoke Yiddish, and often lapsing into Yiddish herself, spoke of her own love for Judaism and Israel.

She remembered the day in 1948 "when Israel was born and we danced in the street...danced for those who could not be there..."

She said she had gone to Israel during every war except the 1948 War of Independence, in order "to witness what it is like to be a civilian in Israel during wartime."

Rabbi Morton Green of Adas Israel Synagogue, for whom Cohen had worked for many years, delivered the tribute, and in her response, Cohen recalled her mother who, "although she had little to give, always found a few pennies to put into the pushke."

Sylvia Klein presented the Jerusalem City of Peace Award and other tributes included Federation vice-president, Cheryl Greenbaum, Sarah Rochwerg for Hadassah-WIZO and a moving letter from Cohen's younger son, Rabbi Steven Cohen of Israel, read by his older brother, Alan, of Toronto.

Book's essays deal with Holocaust

Jewish authors

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

Kenneth Sherman labors in relative obscurity.

TORONTO — The author of nine books of poetry including the recent Clusters (Mosaic Press, $12.95), Kenneth Sherman has received considerable critical recognition, yet he acknowledges he still labors in relative obscurity in an age when the public has lost much of its passion for poetry.

The Toronto writer teaches English composition at Sheridan College and creative writing at York University in order to gain the freedom to maintain his poetry habit.

"If I ever get time off my work, I'll try to write a novel," he says. "But other than that, it's just poetry and essays."

This fall, Mosaic Press is publishing Void and Voices: Essays on Historical and Literary Currents, a collection of essays that Sherman wrote after visiting his ancestral town in Poland.

"It's really a book of meditation on the Holocaust, and many of the essays deal with the Holocaust and Holocaust literature."

As for Clusters, Judaic themes are inherent in many of the poems, but so are more universal themes involving memory, loss and exile.

The imagery is crisp and the effect often stirring and sad, even when Sherman writes on remote subjects such as the mating rituals of a Galapagos turtle or something that exists only in his memory like a pier that once stood at Jackson's Point.

The weird lava landscape that the Galapagos turtles inhabit resounds with the "drawn-out, eerie chorus" of "a hundred moaning voices" during the mating season. "I would like to travel / to that desolate lunar island / and hear for myself / passion mixed with lamentation," he writes in the poem The Galapagos Tortoises.

Sherman travels beneath the surface of experience like the "great, moping bass" that swims beneath the imaginary pier at Jackson's Point. In his poems, especially the masterly title piece Clusters, love is some fleeting mystical process that happens somewhere else and long ago.

"I think the basic human condition is probably alienation. People have different ways of connecting and mine is with words. When I write I get to speak to other writers, living and dead. There's a great line by W.H. Auden — he said, 'Writing is breaking bread with the dead.'"

There's a captivating quality to Sherman's brand of quiet desperation, and even readers who don't normally delve into poetry may be rewarded and moved by these poems.

A prodigy of Montreal poet Irving Layton and a devotee of the Nobel Prize-winning Polish poet Czeslaw Milosz, he is quick to offer a defence of poetry. "A lot of poetry nowadays is just word games. But the best poets have always said something about the anguish of being a human being in one's historical time frame."

Several years ago Sherman was one of three founding editors of Parchment, a journal of contemporary Canadian-Jewish writing, and he speaks excitedly of a literary scene "burgeoning" with good young Canadian-Jewish writers to follow in the footsteps of giants like Layton and Leonard Cohen.

"The Jewish community in Canada is being well represented by a number of fine writers in both prose and poetry. The writing, of course, is very diverse. Anne Michael's style is very different than Carey Fagan's or Matt Cohen's. I wouldn't call it a school but I'd say there are a number of young and middle-aged writers who are attempting to capture the Jewish experience."

IDF arrests 40 Hamas activists to prevent attacks

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Security forces have arrested 40 Hamas activists in West Bank villages in a mass arrest campaign aimed at preventing attacks, and learning the identities of the five suicide bombers who carried out recent attacks in the capital, the IDF said Sunday.

The arrests came after information was received that Islamic extremists were planning to carry out an attack within Israel north of Nablus.

The sweep was mounted late Saturday night under the command of OC Central Command Maj.-Gen Uzi Dayan, as part of a wider effort to smash Hamas' infrastructure.

"Security forces conducted a wide-ranging operation...during which they arrested dozens of Palestinians who are now being interrogated. The operation was conducted as part of activities to deter and prevent terror," the IDF spokesperson said.

IDF soldiers of the Haruv unit of the Golani Brigade, undercover Duvdevan troops, paratroopers and border police clamped curfews and then raided villages near Nablus, in area B, which is under Israeli security control.

Shortly after midnight, security forces swept down on a village in the Nablus area. The troops asked Palestinian police officers to remain in their station before carrying out the raid. Then soldiers raided several houses.

The village was later placed under closure, and telephone lines were cut, Palestinian sources said.

They said that hundreds of villagers were rounded up at a local girls' school, and that 20 to 30 were taken into custody after questioning.

At dawn, IAF planes circled the village on the lookout for Palestinians attempting to flee the area.

Arrests were also made in other villages in the Nablus area. Palestinian sources claim that at least 15 men from these villages were taken.

The IDF also ordered the bridge to Jordan closed early Sunday, for fear that Hamas accomplices could attempt to flee.

In all, more than 200 Palestinians suspected of involvement with Hamas or Islamic Jihad have been arrested since the suicide bomb attacks in Machane Yehuda on July 30 and Rehov Ben-Yehuda on Sept. 4 that killed 20 Israelis.

Recently, security forces uncovered a Hamas terrorist cell operating in east Jerusalem and an Islamic Jihad cell operating in the Samaria region.

During his visit to Austria, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told reporters he was 100 percent sure that the Jerusalem suicide bombers came from the West Bank and not from overseas.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai added that the attackers received backing in the territories.

Meanwhile, members of the Tsurif gang were brought to the Lod Military Court Sunday.

Suspects Ra'ad Abu Hamadiya, 21 and Ayman Kafisha, 27, both of Hebron, have been charged with the kidnap and murder of IDF soldier Sharon Edry in September 1996, the suicide bomb attack in Tel Aviv's Apropo cafe in March that killed three women, and three drive-by shootings in 1996 in which seven Israelis were killed.

The victims were Uri Monk, his son and daughter-in-law from Moshav Tirosh; Yaron and Efrat Unger of Kiryat Arba; Maj. Oz Tivon and Sgt. Yaniv Shimel in a shooting near Karmei Tzur.

In all, the gang numbered six, including the bomber who blew himself up in Apropo, and three being held by Palestinian authorities.

The session was postponed after the suspects' lawyer, Leah Tsemel, failed to show, reportedly due to illness.

But an angry confrontation took place in the courtroom while reporters interviewed the suspects.

Edry's brothers surged at Hamadiya and Kafisha, but were restrained by IDF guards. It was the first time they had seen the suspects in court.

Hamadiya stood up and told them, "I am not afraid of you."

Edry said he hoped the two would get the death penalty. "We are in an emergency situation and must act accordingly," he said.

According to the IDF, the Tsurif cell was led by Ismail Ranimat, 25, of Tsurif, who studies in Hebron. He was jailed in 1993-4 as a Hamas member. Two other members are Gamal Jibril Alhour, 27 of Tsurif and, Ibrahim Abdullah Ranimat, 39, of Tsurif, who was detained numerous times for membership in terrorist cells. These three were detained by the Palestinian Authority.

Notice to the Canadian Jewish Community From the Executive, Chevra Kadisha of Calgary

Mubarak refuses to pardon Israeli convicted of spying

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak has announced that he has no plans to pardon an Israeli citizen sentenced by a Cairo court on charges of espionage.

Mubarak told reporters that, in the case of Azam Azam, he blamed Israel for its "arrogance" and for "mishandling" the situation.

Mubarak said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had insulted the Egyptian judicial system when he called the verdict in the case "twisted."

Azam, a mechanic at an Israeli-Egyptian textile plant in Cairo, was convicted Aug. 31 of spying for Israel. He was sentenced to 15 years in prison with hard labor.

Netanyahu said earlier this month that he expected Mubarak to pardon the 35-year-old Druze man.

Azam, who was arrested last November in Cairo, was charged with giving women's underwear soaked with invisible ink to an Egyptian national, Emad Abdel-Hamid Ismail, who then used the ink to write messages to Israel about the state of Egyptian factories.

The Cairo court sentenced Ismail to life imprisonment for being an accomplice.

Israeli officials have insisted that Azam was not a government agent.

His arrest and trial, which began in April, have exacerbated tensions between Israel and Egypt.

Social gap narrowing

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The gap in educational achievement between Ashkenazi and Oriental Jews is closing at a steady rate of two percent a year, and could be nonexistent by 2015, a Bar-Ilan University researcher found.

Dr. Micha Razel of the School of Education found, that based on nationwide representative samples, whatever gap remains is no longer socially significant. His study also showed second-generation Israelis did better in school than the first-generation, among both Ashkenazi and Oriental families.

Educational achievement was found to be greater among second-generation Israelis as compared to first-generation Israelis, whether from Ashkenazi or Oriental families.

The diminishing gap can also be seen in the fact that in the past, Education Ministry efforts to help children having trouble in school focused on integrating Sephardi children into schools with larger Ashkenazi populations, he said.

Razel said his research indicates that attempts at bridging ethnic gaps have largely succeeded.

HAVE A FOOTHOLD IN ISRAEL!

A Message to CJN Snowbirds

If you will be spending all or part of this winter outside of Canada, there are three options available to you regarding delivery of your Canadian Jewish News.

1/ Continue regular delivery to your home, and arrange for Canada Post to forward The CJN on with your other mail each week.

2/ Advise our Circulation Department to suspend delivery until your return to Canada with no weeks lost in your subscription period.

3/ Arrange with our Circulation Department to redirect The CJN to your winter address at a cost of $5.00 per month.

This charge -- payable by cheque, Visa or Mastercard before departure -- covers the cost of additional postage incurred for out of country mailings.

To make any change in your delivery please call Janice at 416-391-1836, allowing a minimum of two weeks notice.

Call ISRAEL FOR 57¢ per MIN.

Technion

Israel Institute of Technology

Canadian Technion Society

WE WOULD LIKE TO THANK THE COMMUNITY FOR SUPPORTING THE ART EGGLETON CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MOLECULAR MEDICINE RESEARCH.

THROUGH YOUR GENEROSITY NEARLY 4 MILLION DOLLARS HAS BEEN RAISED FOR THIS PROJECT.

PHASE ONE HAS NOW BEEN COMPLETED AND THE CENTRE IS NOW ENTERING INTO THE SECOND PHASE.

The Molecular Medicine Research Facility is conducting ground breaking research in polycystic kidney disease, kidney function and failure, kidney and prostate cancer.

The centre continues its important research and requires your assistance as it enters into phase two.

Begin the New Year with a contribution to Technion. Best wishes for a Healthy & Happy New Year!

Technion, established in 1924, is Israel's oldest university. It is the only university dedicated to Engineering & Medical Engineering Technology. It is one of five institutions in the world to integrate an applied sciences and technology university with a medical school.

Since the inception of the Canadian Technion Society in 1943, we have provided scholarships, fellowships, endowments and support for special projects.

Some of the successful projects include:

- Ethel & Allan Grossman Centre Research in Immunology 1984
- Toronto-Technion High Tech Fund (TTT FUND) From Generation to Generation 1988
- Student Residences 1989
- Russian Immigrant Absorption 1991
- Electron Microscope Centre of Excellence 1993
- Art Eggleton Canadian Centre for Molecular Medicine Research 1996-7

Technion is an integral part of the State of Israel. Its graduates have built Israel's infrastructure from its roads, cities and power supplies to the national water carrier that irrigates the land. The Technion helped create Israel's defense systems and aircraft industries. It established many of the micro-electronics companies and other high-tech industries that today create quality employment and the vital exports that Israel needs to compete in world markets.

The Technion has graduated some 40,000 engineers, scientists, physicians and architects who have made outstanding contributions in Israel and throughout the world.

Canadians have been instrumental in helping Technion develop the industries and infrastructure vital to the survival of Israel.

Your support of Technion supports Israel.

The politics of violence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

A year ago this week, Palestinian rioting erupted throughout East Jerusalem, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Mideast Analysis

The violence, the worst since the Six Day War, caused the deaths of 15 Israeli soldiers and 61 Palestinian civilians and policemen. It was touched off by Israel's decision to open an entrance to an archeological tunnel in eastern Jerusalem running alongside Muslim holy places.

The riots were contrary to the spirit and letter of the Oslo peace accords, the first phase of which, the Declaration of Principles, was promulgated four years ago on Sept. 13.

Since then, there have been scores of further incidents — some 300 — and senior Israeli and Palestinian officials have warned of a renewed intifadah (the 1987-1991 Palestinian uprising, which claimed the lives of 1,067 Palestinians and 114 Israelis).

Such is the situation that the Israeli army has carried out exercises for a possible guerrilla war with Palestinian forces in the autonomous areas.

In the numbing aftermath of last year's bloody outbreaks, there was a lull as Israel and the Palestine Authority (PA) got down to the unfinished business of negotiating an Israeli redeployment from Hebron.

The tranquility was shattered in March, when the PA broke off talks with Israel after Benjamin Netanyahu decided to build a massive Jewish housing project in Har Choma, a district in eastern Jerusalem claimed by both sides.

Palestinian rioting waxed and waned for the next few months, particularly in Hebron, Nablus and Bethlehem. During this period, nine Palestinians were killed and the nature of Israel's increasingly tense relationship with the Palestinians reverted to the pre-Oslo mode.

The sporadic violence — which is symptomatic of the growing mistrust between the Israeli government and the PA, on the one hand, and Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat, on the other — is basically a function of several factors: the breakdown of the peace process and of security cooperation since Har Choma and Hamas' suicide bombings, the closure of the territories, and the recurrence of provocations (such as the notorious poster in Hebron which depicted the prophet Mohammed as a pig).

Is the rioting orchestrated by the PA? Ami Ayalon, head of the Shin Bet, has said that the PA — the weaker party in terms of manpower and weaponry — considers limited and controlled violence as a negotiating tactic, a means of exerting pressure on Israel. Unlike Netanyahu, Ayalon does not believe that the PA has given the "green light" to terrorism.

Although Arafat and his lieutenants stoutly deny any involvement in organizing violence, there is circumstantial evidence to the contrary. In the past month and a half, as the peace process has sharply deteriorated, Arafat has delivered a succession of dire statements which strongly suggest that he is not averse to bloodshed.

- On Aug. 20, he declared that "all options are open to the Palestinian people."
- On Aug. 9, after Israel imposed punitive economic sanctions on the PA in the wake of the July 30 bombing in Jerusalem, he asserted that "we must confront them, in every sense of the word.
- On Aug. 7, following a warning that Israeli measures would lead to "a giant explosion," Arafat called on his Fatah faction in the PLO to "prepare for the battle that Netanyahu is forcing on us, because what is coming is worse than what has already been."

Clearly, the PA regards violence as a bargaining chip in its arsenal.

Notice of Special General Meeting
Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel

Take notice that the Special General Meeting of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel will be held on Tuesday, October 14th, 1997, 7:30 p.m. at CMDA Headquarters, 6900 Decarie Blvd., suite 218, Montreal, Quebec.

The nominating committee has proposed the following slate for election as the Directors:

DIRECTORS SERVING THE SECOND YEAR OF THEIR TERM (1997 - 1998):

Irwin G. Beutel, Oscar Costin, Irving Friedman, Ted Nashman, Joseph Paperman, Dr. David Shapiro, Jerry Wiseblatt.

DIRECTORS SERVING FOR A TWO-YEAR TERM (1997 - 1998):

Mary Wasserman-Libstug, Aaron Chazan, Harvey Cobrin, Robert Garfield, Abe Klugsberg (Ottawa), Miriam Lang, Arthur Levitt, Sydney Lithwick, Jerry Radowitz, Morton I. Rosenthal, Arnold Rosner, Maurice Sadeh, Paul M. Saxe, Councillor Barbara Seal, The Hon. Judge Alfred N. Segall, Alan E. Spector (Toronto), Sarah Swedler (Ottawa), Gerry Weinstein.

HONORARY DIRECTORS:

Herbert Black, Wolf Bronet, Gordon Brown, Sheila Finestone, M.P., Dr. Phil Gold, Rabbi Ira S. Grussgott, Sheila Kussner, O.C., Mayor Bernard Lang, Rabbi Allan M. Langner, Rabbi Leigh Lerner, Louis B. Magil, The Hon. Mr. Justice Herbert Marx, Rabbi Dr. Sidney Shoham, Rabbi Dr. Wilfred Shuchat, Dr. Harvey Sigman, Dr. Hyman Tannenbaum.

Dated at Montreal this 17th day of September, 1997 by order of Arthur Levitt, National President

Sept. 15

- A class action suit was filed against Israel's only cigarette manufacturing company. The lawsuit against Dubek, which is seeking approximately $4 million in damages, is the first of its kind in Israel.

Sept. 16

- Israeli media reported on the visit to Lebanon by Iranian president Mohammed Khatami. Khatami hailed the actions of Hezbollah, called on Muslim countries to support Lebanon against Israel and urged Qatar to cancel its hosting of the regional economic summit in November to which Israel is invited.

Sept. 17

- Israel eased its closure of the West Bank by allowing 5,000 more Palestinian workers into the country.

- The High Court authorized the General Security Service to use special methods in the interrogation of a suspected Hamas militant believed to have information of planned terrorist attacks. In its judgment, the court ordered that the methods not exceed "moderate physical pressure."

Sept. 18

- First-Lt. Eyal Shimoni, 21, was killed and three soldiers lightly wounded when 13 IDF and South Lebanese Army positions throughout the security zone in southern Lebanon came under heavy bombardment.

- Menachem Porush, former head of the Agudat Israel party, told the media that authorities had kidnapped Yemenite babies in the 1940s and 1950s and had given them to Jews, mostly survivors of World War II, for adoption.

- A compromise was reached between the government and Dr. Irving Moskowitz, the owner of a building in Ras al Amud. The three families in the building will leave immediately to be replaced by 10 yeshivah students.

Sept. 19

- The Tel Aviv District Court temporarily banned the sale of a book on the Dakar submarine which disappeared in 1968 with 68 crew members aboard.

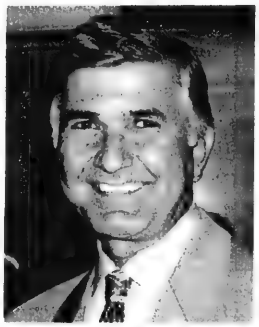
Unorthodox procedure helps heart patients

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An unorthodox surgical procedure not sanctioned in North America has helped "countless" heart patients in Europe, says the director of cardiac surgery at the Toronto Hospital.

Dr. Tyrone David, speaking on New Frontiers in Heart Surgery at the Four Seasons Hotel for Weizmann Women & Science, explained that transmyocardial laser revascularization is a procedure inspired by the hearts of reptiles and amphibians, which "seem to do all right" despite a complete lack of coronary arteries. Instead, the reptile heart has "a bunch of little holes" through which the heart muscle feeds.

With the new procedure, surgeons use lasers to create tiny holes in the human heart. "Surprisingly, the patients survived and many of them had the pain cured," said David, a native of Brazil who has practised in Toronto since 1978 and is known for his own surgical innovations.



Dr. Tirone David

"Unfortunately, the holes closed," he continued, explaining why both the U.S. Food and Drug Authority and Health and Welfare Canada have not approved the procedure for clinical use. (It is being done on an experimental basis in the United States and in Halifax, N.S.)

He's willing to bet the procedure, developed by an Indian surgeon, will become widely available within a year or two. In Europe, it has been used when other therapeutic approaches have failed or cannot be used, he said.

In the past decade, bypass surgery has been shown to have an edge over balloon angioplasty in the case of widespread coronary artery clogging, David noted.

When all else fails, transplantation is the way to go, although there is a dearth of human donor hearts, he said. In England, a clinical trial using genetically engineered pig hearts for transplanting into humans is about to begin, he said. (Pig valves are already used successfully in heart surgery, both here and even in Israel.)

In the United States, mechanical hearts have been approved for clinical use, said David. In New York, he had a taxi driver who was using a mechanical heart as a bridge before a transplant, he said.

The devices "work perfectly well," but cost about $65,000 (US) and can only be unplugged for four hours at a time. "Whether it will come to a point where they have nuclear batteries that work 10 to 12 years, only time will tell," said David.

According to American Heart Association data, this year 1.5 million Americans – and 150,000 Canadians – will suffer heart attacks, of which one in three will be fatal, said David. Although he termed the numbers "alarming," he noted they were much higher 30 years ago.

Exercise is likely the single most important thing people can do to reduce the risk of coronary artery disease, he noted, stressing that the disease, in which deposits of fat eventually clog coronary arteries, is incurable and fatal. "You don't have to be an athlete, but you should be physically active," he advised.

Exercise is a key factor

David also lamented "how wrongly we eat... Ironically even teenagers have some fat in their arteries if they grew up in this part of the world, where the main source of calories is animal fat and animal protein."

He recommended a meatless diet, cautioned against excessive amounts of sugar and fat and noted that the combination of smoking and a diet rich in animal fat is "lethal."

In addition to diet and exercise, weight and how one copes with stress are factors that can be controlled, he said.

To prevent heart attacks, cardiologists advise their patients to change their lifestyles and use preventive therapies, he said.

"Exercise, aspirin, red wine and sex increase the protective [type of cholesterol]," said David.

"I hope my wife is listening," quipped a grey-haired member of the capacity audience.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. With the High Holy Days coming up, I have been wondering about the fat and calorie content of honey.

A. Honey is completely fat free and contains 64 calories per tablespoon. That's just a few more than jam and jelly. Enjoy apples and honey, it is a fat free snack.

Q. I am struggling with what to send my kids for lunch at school. What do you suggest is most important?

A. Send your children a lunch that they like. Too often, parents get caught up trying to send balanced and nutritious lunches, but these efforts usually go unappreciated. Most children prefer eating the same one or two lunches each day. The most important thing is that your child eats lunch and doesn't trade it, throw it out or go the whole day without eating. Try to include a source of protein such as peanut butter, meat, fish, egg, cheese, yogurt or milk.

Q. I have just made my first batch of chicken soup of the season. After skimming, is it high or low in fat?

A. Because we do skim most of the fat off chicken soup once it has cooled, what is left is low in fat and calories. One cup of chicken broth can have as little as 25 calories and 1.2 grams of fat.

Canada-Israel Business Excellence Awards

Five Canadian companies honored

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

Recipients of the Canada-Israel Business Excellence Awards, from left, Alex Glasenberg of Apotex Inc.; E.A. Relle of Atlantic Chemicals and Pharmaceuticals; Martin Maxwell of National Home Products Ltd.; Morrie Gurevitch of Northern Telecom Inc.; and Michael Bregman of Second Cup.

TORONTO — Since the January 1997 free trade agreement with Israel opened the door wider for business, Canadian companies have found new opportunities in Israel, from serving cups of java on the streets of Jerusalem to programming JAVA store fronts on the World Wide Web for Tel Aviv businesses.

The annual Canada-Israel Business Excellence Awards recently paid tribute to five Canadian companies who had the foresight to develop trade relations with Israeli business, even before the free trade agreement came into effect.

Former Ontario premier Bob Rae was a keynote speaker at the event held at the Inn on the Park by the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

The past uncertainty about building trade with Israel has been replaced by a new optimism among Canadian companies seeking investment opportunities, Rae said.

"The range is huge in Israel for the creation of services as much as goods," he said. "Many of the companies being honored are owed a great deal of gratitude because they were the pioneers [in Israeli trade] who took initiative."

The Israeli economy is taking a new shape, he said, showing a willingness in its public sector to seek alternatives. "I think the Israeli government has come to terms with the limits of public finance and recognizes the potential for partnership in the private sector, which Canada can be part of."

Transportation is a growing area for these kinds of partnerships, Rae said, adding that he has maintained a line of communication with the Israel Ministry of Transportation, to discuss opportunities for Canadian companies.

He said, for example, a proposed Tel Aviv subway system would involve significant private investment to run, while a proposed highway through the centre of Israel to be used on a toll basis would involve great investment. Canadian Highways International is currently competing in international bidding on the project.

High technology investment was recognized, as Northern Telecom (Nortel) received an award for its investment in Telrad, Israeli's leading telecommunications equipment supplier. The purchaser of one-fifth ownership was a strategic alliance for both companies, said Nortel president Jean C. Monty. Earlier this year, he indicated that the company is looking forward to realizing the benefits of the Telrad partnership to develop innovation and solutions in its global telecommunication business.

Another Canadian success story recognized at the event was much comparatively low-tech. Second Cup Ltd. was awarded the Price Waterhouse Award for retail operations in Israel for the introduction last year of its first franchise in Jerusalem.

"The way we offer our services is certainly in a North American style, but it has fit into Israeli society quite easily," said Michael Bregman, president of Second Cup Ltd. "We entered into the partnership with an Israeli operator who knew the market and the public's tastes, so time was not lost on having to re-educate ourselves."

He said that iced coffee beverages now becoming popular in North America have been a popular Second Cup offering in Israel.

"I think Israel is a very exciting place to do business, with growth unmatched," he said. "The key is learning to deal with the high levels of red tape associated with business start-up, which are far greater than those found in North America."

Other companies awarded were National Home Products Ltd. for its 20 years in the importing of shaving products, especially razor blades, from Israel's Bond International; Atlantic Chemicals & Pharmaceuticals for its quarter century of industrial importing of pharmaceuticals in its venture with the Teva Group; and Apotex Inc. for exporting generic pharmaceuticals to Israel in partnership with Koor Industries.

JEWISH WOMEN'S CABARET AT BLOOR JCC

Kate Lushington and Libby Scheier are co-hosts of the second Jewish Women's Cabaret Sept. 25 at 7:30 p.m. at the Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave.

Lushington is a writer, director and performer, whose work has been heard on CBC Radio. Scheier has written five books of poetry, directs the Toronto Writing Workshop and is literary programmer for the biannual Ashkenaz festival.

Joining them are the comedy duo Shoshana Sperling and Lisa Brooke, ethnomusicologist Judith Cohen, author Ann Decter, musician-singer Ann Lederman and writer-performer Dorothy Lichtblau. Members $6, non-members $8. 416-924-6211.

* * *

Books & Bagels: The Bloor JCC is presenting its popular Books & Bagels literary mornings, starting Sept. 28 with Matt Cohen, author of Last Seen. 11 a.m., 750 Spadina Ave. Members free, non-members $8. Coffee and bagels will be served. 416-924-6211.

Other dates in this series are: Rick Salutin, Oct. 19; Linda Frum, Nov. 23; Cynthia Holz and Nora Gold, Jan. 25.

* * *

Erica's Paradise: Dr. Erica Knoller's one-woman show chronicles the life of this octogenarian psychologist-artist-actress and Holocaust survivor.

Knoller, raised in an orthodox Jewish home in Berlin, hid in a closet in Holland for three years to escape the Nazis, then went to Israel and India. How she managed to preserve her life, her sexuality and her spirit is the theme of this story.

Sept. 25, 8 p.m., Up There Theatre at Barcode, 549 College St. Sept. 30 and Oct. 3 at 8 p.m., Palmerston Library Theatre, 560 Palmerston Ave. at Bloor St. Tickets $5 at the door. Presented as part of Artsweek '97. Magpie Productions, 416-538-2890.

* * *

Richler Play: Young People's Theatre has announced an upcoming production of Jacob Two-Two's First Spy Case, by Mordecai Richler, directed by Maja Ardal and starring Zale Mednick. For ages 6+. Nov. 8 to Jan. 4. 165 Front St. E. 416-363-5131.

* * *

The Play's The Thing: "Brevity,"said Polonius, "is the soul of wit." Judge for yourself when a trio of actors take on more than 100 roles between them when they stage The Compleat Works of Wllm Shkspr (Abridged), opening Oct. 21 at the Bathurst Street Theatre.

Dressed in Elizabethan garb, the cast members are said to provoke enormous laughs as they race through all 37 of Shakespeare's play in just 97 minutes.

"Weep tears of mirth" and "You will laugh until it hurts," said reviewers of earlier productions on off-Broadway and London's West End. Tickets $20 to $39.50.

* * *

Canadian Culture: Idea of North: A Guide to Canadian Arts & Culture by Tom Henighan is a comprehensive guide to music, theatre, film, dance, visual arts, literature and other arts north of the 49th parallel.

The thumbnail sketches, lists of favorites and the author's lively discussion of the "cultural revolution" that has occurred here since the 1960s highlight the astonishing range and diversity of Canadian artists and their many accomplishments. An interesting book that invites page-flipping. (Raincoast, $21.95).

* * *

More Books: Recent titles distributed by Raincoast Books include Hitler and Geli by Ronald Hayman (Bloomsbury), about Hitler's love affair with his niece; and Hezbollah: Born With A Vengeance, by Hala Jaber (Fourth Estate), which paints a chilling portrait of the world's most secretive and deadly organization.

Yankele Bodo a real treat for Yiddish lovers

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 20-year-old Toronto Jewish Theatre celebrated its first appearance on the Leah Posluns stage with a large crowd of Yiddish-loving fans.

Yankele Bodo, the famed, diminutive Israeli comedian, did not disappoint them with his Yiddish stories, some new, some old.

"We finally made it," said veteran producer Chaim Avron, founder of the Jewish Theatre, referring to the first time that it has been able to rent the commodious facility at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Appearing for the first time in five years, Bodo revealed the true art of the thespian with a bittersweet monologue by an old man bemoaning the failure of his son to visit him, as promised.

In more traditional vein, he lit up the hall with flashes of humor about the current Israeli scene. One favorite was about the 152-year-old ' Soviet immigrant, weighted down with war medals, who, in a quavering voice, admitted that 50 of his years were a gift from the Russian revolution of 1917.

Singer Jenny Feyerman also appeared, along with the Ted Labow trio orchestra.

Bravo! profiles 'great entertainer'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Al Jolson was fond of calling himself the world's "greatest entertainer." Like most show business figures, he was a ceaseless self-promoter. But even after the jarring hype is stripped away, Jolson was doubtless an entertainer of the first magnitude.

Jolson, the subject of a one-hour biography on the Bravo! channel on Sept. 30 at 9 p.m., was born in Lithuania, the son of a cantor who brought his family to America in 1894.

Running away from home, he crooned for pennies at greasy spoons and, at the age of 12, joined a risque burlesque act.

According to Al Jolson, the documentary which competently distills the essence of his life, Jolson made his mark in blackface in a touring minstrel show. Blackface, a reflection of deep-seated racism, evokes shame today, but it was considered a mainstream art form until the 1940s.

Jolson's career blossomed on Broadway. There, before launching into My Mammy and Swanee, his beloved trademark songs, he would boast, "You ain't heard nothin' yet."

By today's more cynical standards, Jolson's singing style can best be described as corny. But in his day, between the two world wars, he could turn virtually any song into a hit, as one former colleague recalls.

In 1927, he appeared in The Jazz Singer, the first Hollywood talkie, and its unexpected success prompted him to make a succession of frothy films (The Singing Kid and Big Boy, to name but two) in which he was the star attraction.

By all accounts, Jolson, a monumental egoist who was insecure at heart, was a study in contrasts, his cruelty and impatience set off by his generosity.

When his career faded, he devoted himself to entertaining American combat troops abroad. Jolson, a Republican, was an ardent patriot who was forever grateful to the country that had embraced him and his parents as immigrants.

During the post-war period, a new generation discovered Jolson, and he capitalized on his renewed popularity in radio and concert appearances and in a movie entitled The Jolson Story. In 1948, two years before his death at 64, he was America's top male singer, surpassing Bing Crosby and Frank Sinatra.

Not bad for a Jewish boy who had once dished out songs for a cup of coffee.

Book places food in its cultural context

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Claudia Roden, a renowned culinary maven, rightly believes that food should be placed in its correct context.

Food, she writes in The Book of Jewish Food (Random House), a magnificent compendium of history, lore, reminiscences and recipes, is "a link with the past, a celebration of roots, a symbol of continuity."

Right on.

Being a dispersed people, Jews have adopted the foods of the countries they've lived in. But in observing dietary laws, they've often developed entirely distinctive dishes.

As a result, she notes, there was always "a touch of otherness" in Jewish cooking, a cosmopolitanism that was almost immediately recognizable. Citing an example, Roden refers us to the Middle East. There, you could tell a Jewish home by the smell of oil, which was used instead of clarified butter.

But even within a single Jewish community, such as India's, there were considerable gastronomic permutations. And in many nations, ranging from Italy and Morocco to Greece and Turkey, cooking varied from one city to another.

In describing the components of Ashkenazi and Sephardi cuisine, Roden reminds us that both were profoundly influenced by local conditions.

Ashkenazi food grew from a medieval German base, with French and Italian influences, and gradually incorporated dishes from Eastern Europe, notably Poland, Ukraine, Hungary and Romania.

East European Jews were partial to substantial foods: warm soups thick with barley and groats, dumplings, pickled and boiled meats, heavy breads, freshwater fish and salt herring, and cabbage and carrots.

By contrast, Sephardi cooking evolved in the Mediterranean basin and throughout the Middle East, writes Roden, who was born and raised in Cairo, educated in Paris and now lives in London.

Roden identifies four broad styles of Sephardi food: Judeo-Spanish (Turkish and Balkan), North African (Moroccan, Algerian and Libyan), Judeo-Arab (Syria and Lebanon) and Iraqi/Iranian.

Sephardi dishes are sensual, aromatic and colorful. "Their cooking is of a kind that lifts the spirits," she declares. Having been brought up by a doting Polish mother, I could argue that a similar case can be made for Ashkenazi delights. But since I savor both culinary traditions, I will leave her statement unchallenged.

The Book of Jewish Food, which is lavishly illustrated, contains more than 800 recipes. Some (schav borscht, klops, and Bulgarian yogurt and cucumber soup) are instantly recognizable. Others (the bride's pigeon, capsicum chicken and meatballs with a sour cherry sauce) may mystify you.

Be that as it may, The Book of Jewish Food, a 600-page plus tome, will satisfy every conceivable taste. It is a landmark in Jewish cookbook publishing.

Conversion committee head hopeful solution can be found

By CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The head of the Israeli committee charged with resolving a crisis over conversions in the Jewish state said a solution could come soon, but at the same time he warned against imposing the pressure of a deadline on the effort.

Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, whose committee members represent the three major religious streams, made the comments here last Friday at a briefing to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

"The fact that we are at one table is in itself an important part of the solution," he said of the committee effort, but "I wouldn't push for a deadline because this will bring us to a dead end."

Ne'eman's formal remarks focused on the Israeli economy, but the discussion inevitably turned to the volatile topic of religious pluralism, in spite of the conference's traditional resistance to providing a forum for what it considers to be a divisive matter.

There has been a steady trickle of reports of various proposals on which the committee is nearing agreement.

But Ne'eman did not spell out any of the plans either at the briefing or at the closed meeting he held afterward with leaders of the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements.

The committee was appointed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to find a compromise that would avert the passage of a controversial bill pending in the Knesset.

The bill, spearheaded by the Orthodox parties, would codify Orthodox control over conversions performed in Israel.

Netanyahu's coalition has agreed to suspend the legislative effort, and the Reform and Conservative movements have agreed to suspend litigation in the courts while the committee is working.

The non-Orthodox movements want to gain recognition for their conversions performed in Israel.

The committee was slated to present its recommendations by Aug. 15, but members have yet to reach an agreement.

"I cannot assume the politicians will approve such a decision," said Ne'eman, "but I am confident" that the committee "will come up with a viable proposal for coexistence in dignity and in harmony and in unity."

Ne'eman underscored the complexity of the committee's challenge and in essence, asked for patience from American Jewry, the vast majority of whom are not Orthodox and have reacted angrily to the bill.

Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of the Association of Reform Zionists of America, thanked Ne'eman for what he said were "unprecedented efforts" to find a solution to the conflict.

But he also reminded him that it was Netanyahu who set the deadline and that equality is "a fundamental principle of democracy."

Ne'eman replied, "Let's not create conflicts, let's not put more flames into the fire."

"The question is not 'Who is a Jew?'" he said. "All of us worship the same God, each in his own way, and nobody can deny, under Jewish law, the recognition of his brother as a Jew."

But, he said, "The problem is intricate because it does not relate only to the immediate question of conversion."

He indicated that the committee had broadened its scope to try to find some solutions to the dilemma posed by roughly 100,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union who are not Jewish "by any standard" in a country where matters of personal status are governed by the Orthodox establishment.

Philip Meltzer, president of ARZA, the Zionist arm of the U.S. Reform movement, said it was apparent Ne'eman came to show American Jews how seriously Israel was approaching the problem and to ask for cooperation.

He said Ne'eman "made it clear" in the closed meeting "that if it is not worked out, it will be disastrous for the Jewish people."

Meltzer added that his movement accepts Ne'eman's stance "with hope" along with "pessimism" about the committee's ability to reach a solution.

Dr. Mandell Ganchrow, president of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, said Ne'eman privately asked leaders "to give the process time."

Compromise reached on Ras al-Amud

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Jews refer to it as the Mount of Olives; Palestinians call it Ras al-Amud.

But by either name, it has become the latest focal point of Israeli-Palestinian friction.

A compromise reached recently between the government of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Jewish families living in eastern Jerusalem failed to assuage Palestinian complaints about a Jewish presence in the mostly Arab neighborhood.

Under the compromise that Israel reached Sept. 18 with three Jewish families living in Ras al-Amud, the families left the building voluntarily, but 10 yeshivah students stayed to maintain a Jewish presence.

The compromise saved Netanyahu from having to forcibly remove the families, a politically volatile step given threats from right-wing members of Netanyahu's coalition that such an action would bring down the government.

But Palestinian officials condemned the compromise. Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat called it a "trick," and during a meeting in Cairo with the 22 members of the Arab League, he urged the Arab world not to improve relations with Israel as long as the peace process remains mired in crisis.

Last weekend, Israeli police scuffled with Palestinians protesting against a Jewish presence in Ras al-Amud, which is located near the Old City.

Protests also spread to the volatile West Bank town of Hebron, but Palestinian police herded away some 20 youths throwing stones at a Jewish settlement there.

In eastern Jerusalem, a former resident of the house that the Jewish families moved into denied that he had sold the structure to Dr. Irving Moskowitz, the U.S. developer who leased the structure to the families.

The Palestinian, Fuad Hadiyeh, said he had been abroad on business and returned to find that the families had moved in and thrown out his belongings.

He also said that he did not own the building, having rented it since the 1980s, and that he was unauthorized to make any transaction involving the building.

Moskowitz maintains that he legally purchased the two-story structure.

The Palestinians broke off negotiations with Israel in March after Israel broke ground for a new Jewish neighborhood at Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem.

The Palestinians, who want the eastern half of the city as a capital of an independent state, accused Israel of altering the status quo in Jerusalem prior to final-status talks on the future of the city.

In contrast to his reaction to the start of construction at Har Choma, Netanyahu came out strongly against the action in Ras al-Amud, saying that any decisions regarding building in Jerusalem should be coordinated by the government, not individuals.

Israeli and Palestinian officials were scheduled to hold separate talks with American officials this week in Washington in an effort to restart the negotiations.

The talks were arranged during a recent visit to the region by U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy, who flew to New York this week to address the 52nd meeting of the U.N. General Assembly, was scheduled to meet in New York with Albright and Palestinian Authority official Abu-Mazen, who is Arafat's second-in-command.

Bloor JCC still producing top handball players

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was a time, not that long ago, when the Bloor Street Y was a mecca for handball enthusiasts.

In the1960s and even into the early '70s, the Y (aka the Jewish Community Centre (JCC), Bloor branch) produced its share of champions. In 1967, it was one of several Toronto venues for the World Handball Championships.

Dozens of guys participated in handball games at the centre in those years and it was known throughout the city and even across Canada for the high calibre of athletes it produced.

Handball no longer enjoys the level of popularity of those pinnacle years, but top players are still coming out of the Bloor Y, now known as the Bloor JCC.

Three guys who play at the centre recently returned from the World Handball Championships in Winnipeg after recording top finishes in their age divisions.

Stan Fromstein, 48, was top Canadian and fourth in the world for those 45 to 50. His son, Bryan, 18, was second highest Canadian and fourth in the world in the 19 and under category while Mike Bargman, was top Canadian and third in the world for those 23 and under.

Fromstein senior, who was designated third seed going into the tournament, played four matches, all against Americans. He sported a 3-1 record going into the semi-finals before losing to a competitor from California.

Fromstein said he was hampered throughout the tournament by an achilles heel injury and then by a sprained ankle he suffered during the competition. By the end, "I felt my feet weren't moving," he said.

His son Bryan had a 2-0 record going into the semi-finals before losing to an athlete from Ireland, while Bargman registered a 2-2 record, including a victory over an Irish competitor to earn the third-place ranking.

Athletes from Canada, the United States, Ireland, England, Wales, France, Mexico, Japan, Australia and Ecuador participated in the championships.

Bargman, who will return to Chicago for the second year of a handball scholarship at Lake Forest College, said his division was weakened by the absence of top players who were trying to qualify for the Spalding/Gatorade Pro Tour in the United States. The top pro handball player earned $60,000 in six tour events last year. Most top players have day jobs, such as firefighters or teachers, he said.

Bargman was nine years old when he was first exposed to handball. Like most kids that age, he was already into hockey and baseball but his father, Stan, played handball at the Bloor Y and he introduced Mike to the game.

By the time he was 11 he was playing in sanctioned tournaments against kids his own age, but he was also getting lots of experience at the Y playing in games against guys in their 30s. In 1991 he finished third overall for kids 15 and under at the World Handball Championships in Phoenix. Eventually he went on to win six Canadian junior championships.

Last season, as a member of the handball team at Lake Forest, Bargman competed in a circuit organized by the U.S. Handball Association. He also was a semi-finalist at the U.S. National Championships, though, he points out, that the tournament didn't include the 16 top pros.

Two years ago at the Canadian Nationals in Edmonton, Bargman advanced to the finals of the open doubles competition before being eliminated. He advanced to the quarter-finals (the final eight) in the singles event before losing to the number three pro in the world.

Fromstein's handball pedigree goes back to 1966 when at age 16, he won his first junior tournament. He watched the world's best players in 1967 when he served as a volunteer at the Bloor Y and in 1980, he won the Ontario title. The Winnipeg tournament was the first time he participated in a world-class event.

Bryan has seen plenty of top level action. He has competed in the Canadian nationals since 1990 and in 1994, coupled with partner Brian Goldfinger, another Bloor player, he won the junior doubles event.

Fromstein added the junior singles title at the 1996 games in Regina and he's attended four U.S. national junior events, advancing to the quarter-finals for his best finish.

In addition to playing regularly at the Bloor Y, both he and Bargman work out at the Fit For Life Club in Scarborough, where, they say, the best competitive handball in Toronto is being played. They also attend clinics at the club as well as teach younger players the intricacies of the game.

"Handball is just a super game. It's a total workout," said Bargman.

Stan Fromstein contends the drop in popularity of the sport over the years is attributable to the difficulty in mastering it. It can take a neophyte a year to play well and it's more physically demanding than either racquetball or squash, he said. Because you don't have the extension provided by a racquet, "you have to run like crazy."

In addition, you have to be ambidextrous to play well and you have to toughen up your hands on a ball that's much harder than those used in racquet sports.

Players can put much more spin on the ball in handball. "You have to take an extra step. Everything is footwork...move, move, move or else you can't be successful," Bargman said.

A lot of racquetball players, he said with more than a trace of scorn, "are broken-down handball players."

Fromstein junior didn't like handball much when he started. But as he progressed he began to appreciate the sport more. He learned a lot playing against older players. "It's a mental game as well as a physical game," he said. Older players "know how to set up rallies, get you moving and put it away."

While it's not that popular in Canada, handball still has a big following in the United States, particularly in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles, Bargman said.

Jews have always excelled at the sport because "it developed in the dungeons of the JCCs." It spread in large part from the 92nd Street Y in New York. In New York, a lot of young people learn the outdoor version of the sport, playing on one wall, though the indoor, four-wall variety is played in Canada, Fromstein said.

One of the world's top players from the sport's early era, Vic Hershowitz, was in Winnipeg for the tournament. In addition, Mark Broverman of Edmonton, one of the world's top doubles players, participated. Two non-Jewish Bloor athletes were also in the prairie city. Ken James and Freddie Bowler. Bowler's son, Ryan, captured two trophies in one-wall and four-wall events, Fromstein said.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

"שנינו נתנהג יפה"; ספרות ילדים חברה המבקשת ללמוד על עצמה ועל תמאפיין אותה מבחינה ערכית, יכולה לעשות זאת בדרך העיון בספרות הנכתבת עבור ילדיה. בישראל, השיניים במאפייני ספרות הילדים העברית, משקפים בבהירות תמורות חברתיות שחלו במדינה. לא מדובר כאן בעיצוב הפסיכולוגי-אישי של הילד אלא יותר במודלים החינוכיים המובאים לידי ביטוי באמצעות דמות הילד-הגיבור בספרות לצעירים.

אם נשווה את דמות הילד בספרות עידן היישוב והקמת המדינה, לעומת הילד בשנות השבעים, השמונים ועד היום, נגלה שינוי נורמטיבי מהפכני שהתרחש בחברה הישראלית.

הילדים חם האוצר הטבעי חחשוב ביותר, וכל חברה מבקשת להטביע את חותמה הערכי על נושאי לפיד העתיד. חברה שדוגלת באידאלים של חלוציות והקרבת הפרט לטובת הכלל, תיצור סיפורים ושירים שבה הילד- הגיבור יממש אף הוא תכנים זהים. חברה הסוגדת בטובת הפרט ושבה טובת הקולקטיב נדחקת לרקע בלבד, תעצב ספרות לילדים שבה יעדר המוטיב של "טוב למות בעד ארצנו". בספרות הילדים של אז, הגיבור האופייני היה ילדותי ופתוח להשפעת הסביבה הבוגרת, משמע החורים יחדיו כל (חלוצי העלייה השניה והשלישית). בשנים שלאחר מלחמת יום הכיפורים, סופרי ילדים כיהודה אטלס, חגית בנזימן ושלומית כהן מתארים גיבור-ילד שלעתים קרובות עולה בתחכומו וביושרו על המבוגרים. פעם היו החורים עובדי עבודת כפיים שסללו כבישים וייבשו ביצות וגאלו את אדמת המולדת; היום אבא ואמא עושים בושות.

הספר כתוב בצורת דיאלוגים קצרים בין אורלי, האם, ובנה, חנוך. הקורא יוכל לזהות בין דברי האם ודברי הבן על-פי גודל הדפוס; דברי הילד נכתבים מופיעים בגדול ודברי האם באותיות קטנות. אורלי קסטל-בלום ידועה כסופרת למבוגרים, בכתיבתה חבוטה ובסגנונה האוונגרדי. וכך גם בספר זה. הדיאלוגים כתובים בטבעיות וללא ליטוש ומונעים כצילום אותנטי מחיי היום-יום. אין כאן משקע חינוכי מעמיק אלא סתם כך, שיחות.

היום אני רוצה לאכול...קטשופ.
רק קטשופ?
רק קטשופ.
בלי שום דבר? אולי קצת ספגטי לידך אולי שניצל בצורת משולשים? אולי מלפפון?
רק קטשופ."

בשנות הארבעים, אבא היה גיבור ואמא עובדת חרוצה וכך כותב אברחם ברוידס לילדים: "נאמר תודה,/ נישא ברכה,/ לאב עמל/לאם טורחה./ להם נקשיב,/אותם נאהב,/ כבוד ויקר/ לאם ואב." באותם ימים לא היתה הטלת ספק בקרב הילדים באמינות ההצהרות שבשיר.

לא כן היום. קסטל-בלום מדגימה תמונה ערכית המשקפת חברה הדוגלת בקידום יחס שוויוני בין ילדים ומבוגרים. בוודאי שגם ילדי החווה יאמרו: "אותם נאהב"(את ההורים) אך יש מחלוקת לגבי ה"כבוד ויקר" ולגבי "להם נקשיב".

"תביאי לי מגבת. (הבן)
לא. (האם)
תביאי לי מגבת מהר, נכנסו לי מים מהשמפו לעיניים.
אבל אם אני אביא לך מגבת אתה תזרוק אותה לאמבטיה והיא תירטב...
תביאי לי מגבת.
קח מגבת, אבל אל תזרוק אותה לאמבטיה...
אבל אני רוצה לעשות כביסה, אני רוצה לעשות כביסה עם המגבת.
טוב, תעשה מה שאתה רוצה."

הקריאה, מאוד משעשעת, הן לילד והן למבוגר (בעיקר לאמהות). האיורים, פרי יצירתה של כרמית גלעדי-פולארד, מקסימים.

BIBLICAL CHICKEN

6 boned chicken breasts, skinned
1/4 cup parve margarine
1 tblsp. olive oil
3/4 cup slivered almonds
2 tblsps. flour seasoned with
1 tsp. salt
10 grinds black pepper

Sauce:

1 1/4 cups dry white wine
2/3 cup orange juice
1 tblsp. honey
3" cinnamon stick
2 small oranges, peeled, pith removed, cut in sections
2/3 cup chicken stock
1 tblsp. grated lemon rind
3 tblsp. raisins
2 tsp. cornstarch, mixed with
1 tblsp. water or chicken stock

Flatten chicken breasts, coat with seasoned flour. Sauté almond slivers in margarine/oil until golden brown. Drain. Add chicken breasts to hot margarine/oil, cook on each side about 3 min. or until golden. Remove from pan and place breasts in single layer in roasting pan. Pour away excess fat from pan without discarding savory brown bits at bottom of pan. Add wine, stirring well and cook 3 min., then add stock, orange juice, lemon rind, honey, raisins, cinnamon stick. Bring sauce to boil. Add cornstarch mixture and stir well until thickened. Pour hot sauce over chicken and bake 20 minutes at 350°F. Serve decorated with orange sections and toasted almonds. Yield: 6 servings.

About families

Dear Susan,

My daughter is a very bright 8-year-old, who is about to enter Grade 3. She has been precocious in every area of her academic development, particularly in math, science and language arts. She is presently enrolled in public school, and my husband and I are wondering whether she will be adequately challenged in the public school system. What do you think?

Dear Reader,

School placement is a very delicate and complex issue. In making the decision, your daughter's social, environmental, physical and intellectual needs as they pertain to school should all be factored in.

A good way to begin would be to determine how happy your daughter is with her present school in terms of all of the factors cited above. It may be helpful to have her rate her happiness on a scale of one to five.

You should next assess how happy you are with her present school placement. If you are not satisfied, you must clearly and objectively identify your area(s) of unhappiness. Be sure you are respectful to her needs and desires, and that any decision to change schools is not based on frivolous or arbitrary reasons on your part.

Grade 3 is a particularly important year in terms of the testing and assessment of children to determine if they have reached specific skill levels in the core subject areas. This program is called benchmarks. By the end of the year, your daughter will also be tested for the gifted program. You may want to await the results from both sets of tests before you determine your daughter's future. You may also consider consulting an educational consultant once you receive these test results. That person will assist in matching your daughter's needs with the school(s) that can best address those needs.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 18 years.

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

OCTOBER 30 – NOVEMBER 9, 1997

Coordinated by the Holocaust Education Week Sub-Committee
Holocaust Remembrance Committee of UIA Federation

HOLOCAUST EDUCATION AND MEMORIAL CENTRE OF TORONTO

For more than a decade, the Holocaust Centre has been dedicated to the memory of the six million Jews murdered during twelve years of Nazi tyranny. Committed to the advancement of public awareness of the Holocaust and its lessons, it offers visitors of all ages an opportunity to share in the memory of the past and the responsibility of the future.

Since its opening, more than half a million visitors from the United States, the Caribbean, Europe, the Middle East, Asia, Australia and South Africa, including 150,000 Jewish and non-Jewish students from across Canada have visited the Centre, learning the important lessons of tolerance, understanding and acceptance.

Visitors view audio-visual presentations that portray the experiences of European Jews before, during and after World War II; see showcases containing memorabilia that enable them to witness first-hand the horror of the Holocaust; and experience the quiet and reflective Hall of Memories, where families have chosen to pay tribute to their loved ones by dedicating a tile in their memory.

School groups also have the opportunity to hear the personal testimony of one of the many Holocaust survivor speakers whose shining example of courage and dignity serves as a role model for a new generation.

The Holocaust Resource Centre, with its extensive library and hi-tech multi-media equipment with access to the worldwide Internet, serves all segments of the community.

The Holocaust Centre is located in the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street, North York.

...In Support of HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK

"It is important to honour the memory of the millions of men, women and children who perished during the Holocaust. To avoid a repetition of history, it is essential to raise public awareness and understanding. Only then can younger generations learn the lessons of the Holocaust and develop a deeper understanding of their responsibility for the future.

Toronto City Council is pleased to salute UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for their efforts to raise public awareness and curb racism and prejudice, by proclaiming October 30-November 9, 1997 HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK."

TORONTO CITY COUNCIL

"On behalf of the citizens of York, I wish to express my deep support for this very important event. While the Holocaust is of particular importance to the Jewish community, it is an event that requires the remembrance of all Canadians. Only by sharing together the sorrows of the past, can we ensure that the future shall never see another Holocaust."

MAYOR FRANCES NUNZIATA,
The Corporation of the City of York

"Remembering the tragedies of our past provides valuable lessons for present and future generations. The horror of the Holocaust, our memory of Jewish pain and suffering is channelled into education toward a useful end, teaching why hatred, bigotry and genocide must be eradicated worldwide. I commend UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for all their efforts during Holocaust Education Week and throughout the years."

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
City of North York

"It is important that we take this time to reflect on the past and learn from it. By remembering the atrocities that humankind has committed, we can work together to ensure that these actions are never repeated."

MAYOR HAZEL McCALLION,
City of Mississauga

"This week is a time to learn about the events of the past and reflect upon them. Feelings of sadness are natural and, for the people who remember loved ones, the sorrow never ends. It is also time to pass on the message to our children and grandchildren that the atrocities of the Holocaust can never be forgotten."

MAYOR FRANK FAUBERT,
City of Scarborough

THE CHRISTIAN-JEWISH DIALOGUE OF TORONTO

Dear Friends:

Our times have seen an upsurge in Holocaust denial and it is no accident that this has been accompanied by a growth in racism in our society. The two go hand-in-hand. Those who would foster prejudice and discrimination in our own day have the most to gain by downgrading and denying the events of the thirties and forties. Education is our best defence against a repetition of an evil like the Holocaust.

For this reason I commend to you the many informative events outlined in this brochure. Among them you will find programs in almost twenty churches throughout the city. We hold them during this time in solidarity with our Jewish sisters and brothers, recognizing that the Shoah, while undeniably a tragedy for the Jewish people, was also a human tragedy.

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee of Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto is honoured to be invited to take part in this week. I am deeply grateful to our colleagues in the Canadian Jewish Congress and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for their invaluable help and support.

Very sincerely yours,

Brian Prideaux

UJA FEDERATION

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL • JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

On behalf of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, I would like to thank and congratulate the members of the Holocaust Education Week Sub-Committee for their efforts in organizing the program described in this brochure.

Every day, the contents of our newspapers and newscasts remind us that the world has not yet learned the lessons of the Holocaust. Racial and religious hate are all too frequently manifested in events both at home and abroad. Holocaust Education Week serves both as a living memorial to those who perished at the hands of the Nazis and as a vehicle for teaching us how decent people must respond to hate and hatemongers.

It is all too easy to turn away from the painful events of our past and to ignore current developments which appear to be sufficiently far away as not to pose any immediate danger to ourselves. But we know better, and Holocaust Education Week reminds us that we know better. The struggle against bigotry is never-ending. This program can help equip us to meet our responsibilities in that struggle.

Yours sincerely,

Joseph M. Steiner
President

CHAIRMAN'S MESSAGE

It is my pleasure to invite you to participate in the 17th Annual Holocaust Education Week. The wide array of excellent programs offered this year allows you to explore, examine and experience many aspects of and approaches to Holocaust studies.

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee is engaged in many activities, all in an effort to fulfill our mandate of remembrance and education. Holocaust Education Week is one of our prize projects, and has gathered a wide following as it has grown over the last several years.

It is only through remembrance and education that we can ensure the memory of those lost and learn the lessons of the Holocaust. Holocaust denial, today's virulent strain of anti-Semitism, has escalated. Racism, bigotry and prejudice have not and will not disappear on their own. All of these blights must be identified, understood and eradicated if we are to improve our society and protect our rights as individuals.

This year, we are delighted that many municipalities are recognizing the importance of our work by proclaiming this week as Holocaust Education Week. We salute the City of Toronto, as well as York, North York, Mississauga and Scarborough. These proclamations of official support are a welcome recognition of the importance of our work.

I would like to congratulate Howard Driman and his diligent committee, all volunteers, for their excellent work and for the outstanding event they have organized. They have done their part, and now it is up to us to attend, learn, reflect and act: let us all rise to the opportunity and the challenge!

With warm regards,

Michael Herman
Chairman,
Holocaust Remembrance Committee
UJA Federation

PROGRAM CHAIRMAN'S MESSAGE

As we look around near and far, we witness incidents of racism, neo-Nazism, Holocaust denial (these will no doubt increase as the number of survivors among us decreases), and indifference to the apprehension and bringing to justice of the perpetrators living in our midst. The importance of, and need for, Holocaust remembrance and education could not be clearer. It is our obligation to honour the memory of those who perished and to educate as wide a cross-section of people as possible, all in an effort to ensure that such a tragedy never recurs.

I am filled with satisfaction and gratitude as I review the many and varied events that constitute Holocaust Education Week, the seventeenth annual program of its kind, unique today in the world of Holocaust education. We are delighted to welcome several organizations that are mounting programs for the first time. These include synagogues, churches and libraries. It is also most encouraging that many young people are coming forward to request involvement and that larger numbers of youth are attending our programs.

We are indebted to the Toronto City Council for once again recognizing our work by proclaiming October 30 to November 9 as Holocaust Education Week, and to the City Councils of York, North York, Mississauga and Scarborough for their support.

I would like to thank my committee members for their enthusiasm and dedication. The passion that we all bring to this endeavour is evidenced by the calibre of events set out in this brochure. I would also like to express my appreciation to all the organizations that enthusiastically commit their time and resources. A special debt of gratitude to Michael Herman and Pnina Zilberman, Chairman and Director, respectively, of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee for their advice and encouragement.

OPENING NIGHT

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30

8:00 PM Leah Posluns Theatre
4588 Bathurst Street, North York

Nat Nadler

"EXODUS 1947: A LOOK BACK"

"Exodus 1947" was the most famous of the Aliyah Bet ships that came from the U.S. to help bring Holocaust survivors to Palestine.

This year marks the fiftieth anniversary of the voyage of this ship, which has been described as the "ship that launched a nation." The intense media coverage surrounding the ship's unsuccessful efforts to land in Palestine with its over 4,500 survivors, and the manner in which the British dealt with the survivors thereafter, are widely believed to have contributed in no small measure to the creation of the State of Israel.

Featured will be a screening of "Exodus 1947," an excellent new documentary, directed by Elizabeth Rodgers and Robby Henson, and narrated by Morley Safer, Canadian-born co-host of CBS-TV's "60 Minutes."

Guest speakers include NAT NADLER, one of the original crew of "Exodus 1947" and PROFESSOR MEIR SCHWARTZ, an Israeli Haganah commander who accompanied the survivors to Palestine. In addition, several passengers of "Exodus 1947" now living in Canada will be present.

(This program has been generously sponsored by the Abraham and Ida Moncik Memorial Fund for Holocaust Education.)

Refugees aboard the Exodus proudly hold flag of Palestine.

Nowhere are people more passionate, politics more volatile, cultural combinations more complex and life itself more fascinating than in Israel.

The issues and actions born in Israel have a magnificent resonance, affecting not just Israelis and their neighbors in the Middle East, but nearly every citizen in the world.

The Jerusalem Report brings you face to face with the significant events, the changing attitudes and the powerful people who make the policies and wield the power in this enormously important global arena.

If you want to immerse yourself in the sights, the sounds, the society, the very texture of Israel and the Jewish World, The Jerusalem Report is your magazine!

Moments of the present

Like the tides that surge and recede by dint of beckoning forces, our lives too are shaped by energies and currents that we mostly feel, but can neither see nor understand.

However, during the first 10 days of Tishrei, the days of introspection and of self-assessment, the passage of our years becomes somehow clearer to us. For religious and irreligious alike, Rosh Hashanah reminds us of time's constant melancholy tug upon the forward momentum of our lives.

Time – and the awareness of it – are ever present factors that shape human life. And how we relate to time is an ever present factor that shapes individual lives.

The late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik wrote that consciousness of time, along with consciousness of place, were the two fundamental dimensions of kedushah, of holiness. But he pointed out there were two categories of time-consciousness: qualitative and quantitative. Only the former, qualitative time-consciousness, he emphasized, was the means to a life of higher meaning and purpose, of commitment and creativity.

Editorial

Qualitative time-consciousness, he wrote, was "the appreciation of the enormous implications inherent in the fleeting moments of the present. No fraction of time, however infinite, should slip through the fingers, left unexploited; for eternity may depend upon the brief moment."

The above photo by Paul Pascal, one of the winners of The CJN Rosh Hashanah photo contest, conveys a sense of qualitative time-consciousness in a poignant and almost poetic way.

The contrast between the timeless, innocent, endearing little boy and the timeless, ancient craggy stones of the Wall enables us to see and helps us to understand what we usually can only feel, what Rabbi Soloveitchik referred to as the "enormous implications in the fleeting moments of the present."

The page of the calendar turns to 5758 and we will pray that no longer will infinite fractions of time slip through our fingers.

Bibi speaks to The CJN

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu gave a Rosh Hashanah interview in his Jerusalem office to Edgar Asher, The CJN*'s Israel correspondent. The conversation covered many of the present political, social and economic issues that affect the Jewish people in Israel and in the Diaspora.*

CJN: Mr Netanyahu, would you give your views concerning the crisis over the occupation of the house in Ras Al Amud, following the Sept. 18 agreement with U.S. millionaire Irving Moskowitz, which resulted in the three families leaving his east Jerusalem property.

NETANYAHU: Israelis have the right to live anywhere within the sovereign territory of Israel. But in the case of Jerusalem we tend to build neighborhoods in particular places. There will be a new neighborhood in Har Choma, thousands of houses for both Jews and Arabs. Har Choma is empty and very large. It is government policy to permit private contractors to build at Har Choma — we haven't decided to build in Ras Al Amud.

The question of the law of eviction and protection of property is clear, but the law is not so clear about national security risks and this we have to consider also. We want to defuse the tension and preserve the unity and rights of the people. It is a complicated equation, but I think it is achievable.

Rosh Hashanah 5758

Message from the prime minister of the State of Israel Mr. Benjamin Netanyahu, on the occasion of Rosh Hashanah 5758-1997

The coming year is special for us. It marks the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel.

A hundred years ago the founder of modern Zionism, Theodor Herzl, dreamt an impossible dream. He predicted the establishment of a thriving Jewish state in the Land of Israel.

His sense of history was extraordinary and his vision uncanny. But I think even he would have been pleasantly surprised by the achievements of this state.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Today almost half the Jews in the world live in Israel. We are a regional power with a strong economy and a proved ability to defend ourselves.

Our standard of living and level of productivity are comparable to those of leading European states. In the sciences and the arts we are among the leading nations of the world.

We have made significant strides towards deregulating, demonopolizing, liberalizing and privatizing the Israeli economy.

We are the world's capital in Jewish studies, and we are putting special stress on education programs which aim to preserve our values and the feeling of Jewish oneness both in Israel and the Diaspora.

We have signed peace treaties with two of our neighboring states, and we are in the midst of a peace process with the Palestinians.

I have no doubt that in the near future we will achieve peace with security for our country. And I hope that with the help of the democracies we will also be able to remove the dangers to world peace posed by the predatory regimes in the region.

But there is more to our security than the physical safety we must have. Security also means the preservation of Jewish unity, the nurturing of the bond which ties Jews everywhere. Israel's power is not limited to what we have here. It is the power of a people who may live in all the corners of the globe, but whose heart is with us in Israel.

We have good reason to be proud of our achievements. But we must not forget that the realization of the Zionist dream — the ingathering of the Jewish people in the land of Israel — is not yet complete. Our goal for the next decade must be to have a majority of the Jewish people living in Israel.

Rosh Hashanah message from the president of the State of Israel, Ezer Weizman.

Dear Friends,

Rosh Hashanah this year coincides with Israel's 50th anniversary. Much has been achieved during these 50 years. Millions of immigrants from the four corners of the earth have been successfully integrated into Israeli society. Israel stands at the forefront in science, technology and agriculture. Israel is recognized by most countries in the world, and their leaders are anxious to visit and learn from our experience.

Ezer Weizman

All this must be borne in mind considering the 50 years of ongoing struggle for our very existence and for achieving peace with our neighbors. This past year has had its full share of great tragedies. No matter how severe and painful the losses incurred, we must not become victims to helplessness and despondency. We are in the midst of a very difficult and protracted process, with many painful contentions. However, just as peace treaties were concluded with Egypt and Jordan, I am convinced that, eventually, these, too, will be achieved with the Palestinians and our other neighbors.

You were always proud when Israel fought and won her battles. Now Israel is strong and she warrants no less your continued pride and support. The stronger we are and the greater in number, the easier it will be to achieve our aims. I, once again, call on you, our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora, to join us in creating a nation, a light unto the nations.

On Rosh Hashanah, we pray for a better year to come, for peace and well-being and for the values we wish to see come true. Let us learn from the past and look ahead to a better future.

Shanah tovah u'gemar chatimah tovah.

Greetings from Israel's Ambassador to Canada, David Sultan, and Canadian Jewish Congress president, Goldie Hershon, on page 28.

A NEW YEAR
A NEW BEGINNING.

Rosh Hashanah is traditionally a time to look back at the year just past. It is also a time of looking forward to a New Year... a new beginning.

May this New Year be one of peace. Peace of mind; peace of spirit. And may it bring peace to our homeland, and a new beginning for its people.

L'Shanna Tova,

Benjamin Netanyahu

Nazi cases to resume

No further delays to be tolerated

By STEPHEN BINDMAN
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court of Canada has finally cleared the way for three contentious Nazi war crimes cases to resume, but not without a sharp attack on the two top judges of the Federal Court.

The country's top court last week also gave a strong endorsement to Canada's efforts to deport suspected Nazi collaborators and made it clear that no further delays will be tolerated.

In a 9-0 judgment written in the name of the entire court, the Supreme Court said there is a strong public interest in quickly bringing alleged war criminals to justice and having "allegations of the most wicked kinds of criminal activity" dealt with in court.

"The crimes involved rank among the most heinous in history and the civilized world's resolve to apply the appropriate sanctions should not be interfered with lightly," the court judgment said.

"What is at stake here, in however small a measure, is Canada's reputation as a responsible member of the community of nations."

Jewish leaders were elated that the three denaturalization cases that have been bogged down in the courts for almost three years can finally get under way and they were heartened by the Supreme Court's strong remarks about war crimes.

It was, after all, the same Supreme Court that crippled federal efforts to prosecute suspect Nazis with its 1994 ruling upholding the acquittal of retired Toronto restaurateur Imre Finta.

"I'm thrilled that the Supreme Court has said that people who have allegedly committed horrendous crimes ought not to walk free in this country without at least facing the courts," said Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's war crimes committee.

David Matas of B'nai Brith Canada said he hopes everyone involved in war crimes cases – from judges to prosecutors – "learns a lesson" from the ruling.

"That means getting all these cases scheduled as quickly as possible. I don't think we should see in the future the kind of scheduling we saw in the past where there's a day here, there's a day there.

"We've got a biological clock ticking that's on the verge of exploding. We just can't afford to let these cases take the 10 years they looked like they were going to take."

The Supreme Court ruled that a private meeting between a senior federal lawyer and Chief Justice Julius Isaac of the Federal Court of Appeal to try to speed up the war crimes cases was a "serious affront" to the appearance of judicial independence.

But the court said the "imprudent actions" were not serious enough to warrant halting entirely

Memories of a Rosh Hashanah past

As he sat, usually but not always alone, in the cocoon-like comfort of his study, looking at old photographs, memories were his constant companions.

* * *

He recalled a time long ago when he entered a new grade and a new school.

A relative newcomer to the neighborhood and awkward in appearance, he was self-conscious and felt very nervous as he settled into a seat near no one he knew among the more than 30 other students in the band class, the majority of whom would be his classmates for the next seven years.

The first thing the nervous young boy noticed about his music teacher was the man's hair. He styled it in a severe brush-cut, virtually no hair along the sides but a paint-brush-square, thicket of short hair on top. He wore black horn-rimmed glasses that rested on rather than wrapped around his ears.

From the way he looked and the way he dressed and the way he spoke, the teacher was probably a marine on temporary leave at this junior high school. To the new student, the teacher seemed to be very old, likely nearly 30.

By the end of the first week of school, all the students in the class had received their instrument designations.

He had hoped for the drums but the marine assigned him to play the french horn. Only the tuba would have been more of an embarrassment to him.

The horn looked funny. He had to put his right hand in its large bell-shaped end to hold the instrument properly at rest on his lap or in the air while playing. And he had to sit between the tubas and the baritones. For a long time, the only sound he could extract from that instrument reminded him of the painful sob from a young moose. It certainly didn't sound like music. It came in a large heavy case which weighed him down walking to and from school.

The french horn actually descended from an animal's horn which had been used originally and primitively hundreds of years earlier to call men to the hunt. Thus, while the first horn had no valves; and undoubtedly no carrying case, the french horn he used had three valves and, as already mentioned, a large and bulky carrying case.

The marine expected him to clean the horn once a week. A cleaning simply meant applying lubricant to the tubing of the valves to enable them to be removed smoothly without any scraping or scratching or other damage to the brass. The recommended lubricant was petroleum jelly.

One day, he cleaned the horn with Vicks Vapor Rub. He could not find any petroleum jelly and inasmuch as the texture of the two gooey creams was the same, he saw no harm in applying the vapor rub all over the sliding tubes.

Flowing harmony

He knew he had made a mistake as soon as he smelled the result. It smelled real bad .

And the marine confirmed it the next day. He called the young boy, still awkward, self-conscious and nervous, into the principal's office to ask why he had attempted to sabotage the horn. Did he not know how expensive and delicate a brass instrument it was?

However, something the marine noticed in the boy's eyes – fear and trembling – convinced him quickly that the boy was not a saboteur. He let him go back to the class but only after he had wiped away all the Vicks Vapor Rub.

The hardest aspect of learning how to play the horn was mastering the required embouchure. Embouchure means the position and the application of the lips to the mouthpiece.

Mouthpieces could not be shared among french horn players. Thus he had to buy his own. In fact he had to buy two mouthpieces so that he would always have a spare in the event that he lost one.

The french horn mouthpiece is the smallest of brass instrument mouthpieces. As result, exact positioning of the lips against the small circular opening and tightly squeezing them against each other, not against the hard metal of the mouthpiece,were essential for the proper playing of the instrument. For more than a month, his lips were sore. Every now and then he developed a cold sore that would make his mouth and lips hurt even more.

Eventually, his lips grew accustomed to the idiosyncrasies of the small horn mouthpiece. He no longer developed cold sores. He didn't mind sitting between the tubas and the baritones, and he developed a love for music, for the exhilaration of joining disparate brass, wind, string and percussive sounds into recognizable melodic patterns, and especially for anchoring the deep, flowing harmonies, which was the horn's first responsibility from the back row of the orchestra.

Those seven years meant a great deal to him. But when he went to university, he never played the french horn again. But he never forgot his proper embouchure.

* * *

Sixteen years later, the young boy had become a young lawyer. He was now married, with three young children and a fourth on the way. He had an ear for music and he still loved the sound of deep, flowing harmony, but he hadn't thought of, let alone practised, his embouchure for more than a dozen years.

On a clear, blue-sky day of August during the heat of a hot summertime, his father suffered a major heart attack. That's how the doctor's described it to him, "a major heart attack."

For weeks his father lay in the hospital, connected by tubes and wires and cords to a number of display panels and other serious medical equipment.

The sight of seeing his father so immobilized was irreconcilable to the young lawyer. He tried always, when visiting him in the hospital, to mask his sadness but it was very difficult and he undoubtedly failed to do so on occasion.

Nevertheless, his father was eventually released from hospital. Weak, even frail, his father now lived in emotional and psychological shadows, no longer in the shine of the full sunlight where he had lived and encouraged others to live for 68 years.

When finally he brought his father home, it was to an altered world, a diminished world.

Rosh Hashanah arrived that year one week after his father left the hospital. But the doctors forbade him from attending synagogue.

The grief in his heart was now double. He was a tailor who always sang, who always needed to sing. And singing in synagogue was where he loved to sing most

But that year he would not be in synagogue; he would not sing; nor would he hear the shofar.

On the first day of Rosh Hashanah, after the Musaf services were finished, the young lawyer and his family walked to his father's house

They entered the home to see the father sitting in the easy chair that dominated the small living room,

Jewish school system set to examine education changes

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Educators in the Jewish day school system here are adopting a wait-and-see attitude to Education Minister John Snobelin's recent sweeping changes to the school year.

And unlike the public schools, there's no talk of a teachers' strike in the Jewish day school system.

Although Snobelin reversed a policy to begin the public schools' academic year a week before Labor Day, he apparently plans to proceed with adding an extra two weeks of class time for elementary grades and three weeks for high schools.

Snobelin backed down on beginning the academic year in late August, following complaints from rural MPPs who said the move would affect farm labor, and from urban residents who also opposed the idea.

Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, the new director of the Board of Jewish Education (BJE), said Jewish day schools are not obliged to follow provincial directives.

However, the Jewish school system plans to look at each of Snobelin's proposals, Rabbi Unterman said.

"Each school will look at the reforms to see to what extent they can accommodate them, as needed," he told The CJN.

Individual day schools can implement some reforms and not others, Rabbi Unterman said.

Rabbi Abraham Soffer, educational director at Associated Hebrew Day Schools, also said his school "will take each recommendation and examine it on its merit. We can decide to reject it or adopt it."

In the meantime, Associated will wait to see how the reforms play in the public system.

Snobelin said he'll press ahead for more school days, possibly by reducing the number of teachers' professional development days, going to full days instead of half days at the start of the year and cutting exam time by a week. He did not rule out shortening the Christmas and Easter breaks.

In Ontario, students are required to be in school for 194 to 197 days, below the 200-day day standard in other provinces. Rabbi Soffer said students at Associated and other Jewish day schools attend for an average of 183 days a year, a figure that can vary depending on when Jewish and statutory holidays occur.

Public teachers' unions are threatening a province-wide illegal strike within weeks unless Queen's park backs down from its reforms.

Bill 160 would not only extend the time teachers and students spend in the classroom, it would allow Queen's park to set class size, take over the setting of property tax rates and cut preparation time for teachers.

Rabbi Soffer said there's no talk of a strike among teachers in the Jewish system, who "have no luxury" to ask for more.

He said teachers at Associated get just two professional development days.

Snobelin said he wants preparation time for teachers reduced to 40 minutes a day, the same, Rabbi Soffer noted, as teachers in the Jewish system now get.

Jewish day school teachers' contracts will expire this academic year, he said, and negotiations will commence right away. But Jewish schools "can't afford more."

Rabbi Marvin Pachino, headmaster at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), said he couldn't comment on the reforms because he hadn't seem them in detail.

But he said his school could be affected by the changes, especially if they alter graduation requirements, such as the number of class hours needed per credit. At CHAT, that number is currently 110.

He said CHAT is committed to upholding provincial guidelines if they directly affect students.

CHAT gets major donations

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — CHAT, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, has moved one step closer to realizing its dream of a new home.

A $3-million donation from Anne Tanenbaum was officially announced at a recent ceremony at CHAT's current facility on Wilmington Avenue in North York, as was a major gift from the Ghert family.

CHAT president Norman Grill told The CJN that these gifts, about one-third of the total necessary to build the new school, kicked off a major fundraising campaign. He said that the school hopes to start building next May or June, and to open in 1999.

The school, which will be called the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Education Centre Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, will be built near the Bathurst Jewish Centre, on the grounds of UJA Federation.

Grill said that the school now has an enrolment of 760 students, more than three times the number of 25 years ago.

Funds are being raised in conjunction with UJA Federation's Vision 2000 program.

Congress postpones decision on restructuring

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A decision on the restructuring of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) was postponed until the national plenary in Winnipeg May 24 to 26, 1998, at the recent CJC national executive meeting.

It was described by national co-chair Robbie Diamond of Toronto as the most critical issue facing Congress.

A restructuring package presented to the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) was returned with a request for more specifics and a list of key priorities of CJC and an explanation of how they would be implemented, said Zena Simces of Vancouver, Pacific region vice-president.

A representative of the CJF has been added to the small CJC committee planning the changes, said Prof. Jonathan Calof of Ottawa, and drafts of the new plan are being shared with the CJF.

"This is an open process, it is not secret. We'll talk to anyone, anywhere," said Calof.

A plea to "discount the bean counters," in ongoing negotiations over the CJC's future, was made by David Attis of Moncton, recipient of the Samuel Bronfman medal for his work on behalf of Jewish causes.

"The CJC was the heart and soul of Canadian Jewry," he said. "The Jewish family has hit on hard times. The CJC now serves the agenda, instead of setting it. It has become insular and withdrawn. Who will care for the small communities and reclaim the soul of Jewry?"

Shifts in the Jewish population of Canada have resulted in a major increase in the number of Toronto delegates among the 1,500 eligible for the plenary to be held in Winnipeg. It has also resulted in a small boost in the number of Pacific region and Manitoba delegates, a large decrease for the Atlantic region and smaller decreases for the Quebec, Alberta and Saskatchewan regions.

Housekeeping changes to make the work of the credentials committee more efficient were presented by honorary national counsel Keith Landy and approved. One modification will essentially eliminate on-site registration of delegates, a contentious item at the last plenary, he said. Non-voting observers will be able to register.

On the issue of a proposed bill that would legalize only Orthodox conversions in Israel, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa reported that all groups in Israel are meeting together and the beginnings of a working proposal are apparent, according to sources close to the discussion.

"It is encouraging to hear that," Rabbi Bulka said. "This is a watershed that augers well. The best thing is to wait."

Of the 381 Russian immigrants from Israel who asked for refugee status in Canada in the second quarter of this year, only seven have been approved, reported Les Scheininger, immigration chair.

"We are gratified with these figures because such refugee applications have been a thorn in our side," he said.

At one time Israel was at the top of the list of countries from which most applications in Canada originated, but now Israel is in 18th place.

Not enough Jewish groups are visiting Israel, Jack Silverstone, CJC executive director, said, reporting on his year's leave of absence in that country. "I never felt insecure at any time," he said.

But ordinary Israelis consider peace a dead issue because "there is too much blood in the streets."

Based on the latest census, the executive increased the number of delegates from Toronto and its outlying area from 370 to 500 (an increase of 35 percent); and approved 116 for Vancouver and Victoria, a boost of 23; 100 for Winnipeg, up seven; and a reduction to 66 from 85 for the Atlantic region. There were decreases of 25 delegates for the Quebec region to 405, seven for Alberta to 93, and a total of 20 each for Regina and Saskatoon, down from 30 for each city.

Though Toronto and its environs, had a dramatic increase in population and delegates, Hamilton, Windsor, London and outlying communities in Ontario were all decreased by five delegates each.

Montreal lost 10 delegates and will send a total of 390, while Quebec City lost 10 and outlying Quebec communities lost five.

Ottawa (National Capital District) stayed even at 61 Halifax lost 10, Nova Scotia communities 20, New Brunswick 20, Newfoundland 16, and Prince Edward Island stayed even at one. Calgary and Edmonton lost about 18 each.

Though Scheininger proposed an amendment to have Toronto listed as Greater Toronto, he withdrew it when it was pointed out by David Rotenberg that this would include Thornhill, which is in York Region and not included in the new mega-Toronto. Instead, the executive passed an amendment adding outlying areas to major cities.

Har Choma, settlements, to continue: Bar-Ilan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The present Israeli government intends to press ahead with the Har Choma project in eastern Jerusalem despite Palestinian objections, a key advisor to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu declared last week.

And neither will Israel stop expanding existing settlements in the territories, added David Bar-Ilan, Netanyahu's director of policy planning and communications.

"We intend to continue construction at Har Choma so as to meet a housing shortage for Jews and Arabs," he said in an interview prior to delivering a speech on Israel's 50th anniversary at Congregation Shaarei Shomayim under the auspices of the Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

Bar-Ilan, former editor of the Jerusalem Post, maintained that Israel was not violating the Oslo accords, as the Palestine Authority (PA) claims, by building in Har Choma and in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Pointing out that the previous Labor party government expanded settlements at a faster rate, Bar-Ilan suggested that settlement expansion was a necessity.

"We're not expanding settlements territorially, but increasing the number of apartments to keep pace with population growth. Living communities must expand. If that's provocative, life is provocative."

Denying that Israeli unilateral actions provoke Palestinian terrorism, Bar-Ilan said that most of the fatalities caused by suicide bombings took place under Israel's "most conciliatory" government, led by Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres.

"Does anyone really believe that if we stopped all settlements that the Palestinians would crack down on terrorism with all their might and with all the forces at their disposal? Anyone who says that would be insulting my intelligence."

Turning to the faltering peace process, Bar-Ilan said it can be saved if the PA cracks down on the terrorist infrastructure in the autonomous areas.

Bar-Ilan contends that Arafat understands "the gravity of the problem" since U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's visit to the region last month.

According to Bar-Ilan, the PA has presented what looks like a practical plan to combat terrorism on a systematic basis.

"But we haven't really seen any action yet. If Arafat wants to join the nations that can be called peace seekers, he must fight terrorism." All other considerations, such as the unity of the Palestinians, are excuses, he charged.

"We obviously can't rely on (Palestinian) declarations anymore, but only on actions. It's very difficult to believe Arafat will do what he says, but we can hope."

In the meantime, he said, Israel has presented the PA with a list of 36 terrorists it wants extradited.

Bar-Ilan suggested that Israel is militarily prepared to carry out "surgical operations" against terrorist bases in the Palestinian autonomous areas if "the PA will not do it." But he cautioned that Israel will not do anything drastic. "We're not thinking of an invasion," he said.

Bar-Ilan urged the Palestinians to lower their expectations of what they can realistically achieve in final status negotiations with Israel, which have yet to begin.

"The Likud said all along it would not give up an inch of territory. Oslo presented the Likud with facts on the ground. Likud has adjusted its expectations to accept these facts.

"We expect the Palestinians to adjust their expectations if they want peace. We have adjusted to the reality of Oslo. The Palestinians must adjust to the reality of Israel's security needs."

Bar-Ilan said that Israel can live with an independent "self-governing Palestinian entity" with limited powers, but not with a fully sovereign Palestinian state capable of forming a large army, entering into military alliances with hostile neighbors, controlling access to Israeli air space and depriving Israel of a substantial part of its water resources.

"Israel cannot permit that."

Bar-Ilan claimed that a sovereign, unarmed Palestinian state would also be unacceptable. "It is almost a contradiction in terms. It could not be trusted to keep itself demilitarized."

Bar-Ilan declined to be drawn into a discussion of Netanyahu's Allon Plus plan, which he reportedly presented to his cabinet several months ago. Under the plan, Israel would retain at least half of the West Bank after a final settlement with the Palestinians.

"I don't think we can draw maps with the media. But the Allon Plus plan, in general, has the support of a very broad consensus in Israel, and we hope the Palestinians will not again miss an opportunity to accept something along these lines."

Bar-Ilan described as "baseless" a recent report in the Tel Aviv daily Yediot Aharanot concerning Israel's strategy with respect to bilateral talks with Syria. The newspaper reported that Netanyahu had informed Damascus that he was ready to adopt Yitzhak Rabin's formula of equating the depth of an Israeli withdrawal on the Golan Heights with the depth of peace with Syria.

Describing Netanyahu's policy, he noted, "We've said over and over again that we want to negotiate with Syria in good faith and with no pre-conditions." Bar-Ilan also said that Israel was well within its rights to keep the Golan.

Claiming that an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan would not necessarily yield real peace, Bar-Ilan said: "Syria really doesn't want peace the way we understand it."

Singular eloquence

The Supreme Court of Canada had the last word. "The crimes involved rank among the most heinous in history, and the civilized world's resolve to apply the appropriate sanctions should not be interfered with lightly."

This was the principle the court enunciated last week in rendering its judgment on the request by Erichs Tobiass, Johann Dueck and Helmut Oberlander to permanently suspend the effort by the government of Canada to "denaturalize" and then deport them from this country. The court then applied the facts of the case to that principle.

The crimes of which they wrote were the crimes against humanity perpetrated by the Nazis and their collaborators during World War II, among whose members Tobiass, Dueck and Oberlander stand accused of being. The appropriate sanction, in this case, is Canada's attempt to expel these men from within its borders.

Most importantly, the court determined that the secret meeting between Julius Isaac, the chief justice of the Federal Court, and Ted Thompson, the former assistant deputy minister of the Department of Justice, did not warrant stopping the government's attempt to expel the three applicants.

The court criticized Isaac and Thompson. "The appearance of independence suffered a serious affront." But the court concluded the meeting had not impaired nor will it impair "the ability of the judges of the Federal Court to function independently and in accordance with their oaths." Indeed, the court expressed a measure of understanding for the reason underlying the misguided behavior by Isaac and Thompson. "We believe Thompson's motives were proper. It was his judgment that is questionable. What Thompson did was not wicked or done in bad faith. It is enough to say that what he did was inappropriate."

Thompson's motive was the desire to have Associate Chief Justice James Jerome proceed with the denaturalization case on which he was sitting, with even a bare modicum of reasonable dispatch. "In our view, [Jerome's] dilatoriness defies explanation," the court wrote.

The judgment unlocks the wheels of justice to spin once again in the deportation cases of Erichs Tobiass, Johann Dueck and Helmut Oberlander. This is a very important result.

But it also affirms with unchallengable authority and with singular eloquence one of the justifications long pleaded by the many Canadians who have clamored for the prosecution of the Nazis among us. "What is at stake here, in however small a measure, is Canada's reputation as a responsible member of the community of nations. In our view, this concern is of the highest importance."

It is now up to the federal government to demonstrate that, as a member of the community of nations, of the civilized world, it will indeed have the resolve to apply the appropriate sanctions to the war criminals clinging to their Canadian refuge.

Elie Wiesel's true message

One of the themes that Elie Wiesel "meandered extemporaneously through," as mentioned by David Lazarus (CJN, Sept. 18, Montreal edition only), happened to be his introduction and the basis for his talk. This theme was to return to true Torah learning, revisiting the Chumash and Talmud, as a way of brushing up on Judaism, rather than taking a Holocaust class at a university. Wiesel said, when it comes to Yiddishkeit, we should not try to learn from morbidity, but instead look to the "living" source, our Torah.

The very title, Ethics of Memory, the necessity to transmit to future generations what took place before their time, includes the nightmares of World War II, as well as Jewish heritage.

It was these words that resonated and set the stage for a message we so need to hear.

Election of CZF delegates unresolved

Re: "CZF won't hold elections for delegates to WZO" (CJN, Sept. 18).

The Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) has not made any decision regarding elections and your statement, "[CZF] has decided not to hold nation-wide elections," is incorrect.

While the constituent organizations are attempting to reach an agreement regarding the distribution of delegates, the rules are quite clear that if there is not agreement a member can call for elections. The CZF executive and the area elections committee have not made any decisions respecting elections.

ARZA Canada, like all other constituent members, retains the right to call for elections. While I agree with Kurt Rothschild that elections would be expensive, I do not agree that they would necessarily be "divisive and...produce skewed results." The opinions expressed in your article by Rothschild are his personal opinions and do not reflect an official position of the CZF.

As president of CZF, Rothschild is making a genuine effort to resolve the matter in the best interests of the organization and he continues to have ARZA Canada's full support in these efforts.

No excuse for delay on hate charges

There is absolutely no excuse for the Toronto police street crime unit or hate crimes unit to not lay charges of promoting hate against the Nazi skinheads who publicly shouted hate messages against the Roma refugees (Gypsies) while marching in front of their Scarborough motel. ("Police urged to lay hate charges in skinhead march," CJN, Sept. 4).

On Sept. 5, I called Det.-Sgt. Dino Doria, head of the hate crimes unit, to find out if any charges had been laid or will be laid against these skinheads. He replied there were none, and that the unit must first get "authorization from the attorney general," Charles Harnick. What's Harnick waiting for? Another Nazi march or attack?

It's important to point out the social political context for this recent racist outbreak. About three weeks ago, the Toronto press were blaming the newly arrived Roma refugees for taking up too many beds in Metro shelters.

I urge people to pressure Harnick to lay charges against these Nazi skinheads. Remember, the Nazis mass-murdered approximately 500,000 Gypsies during the Holocaust. They are our brothers and sisters.

The courage to take a risk

Rabbi Mordechai Zeitz's "Take time to reflect on life's changes" (CJN, Sept. 11), raises this significant question: What inhibits our ability to make real, profound changes in our lives proactively, of our own choosing, in our own time? He answers this by suggesting that we must give up something, discard the old, before adding the new. But he doesn't suggest how, and that's the rub! For many, letting go is hard. And beginning anew feels daunting.

Abraham unknowingly gave us a paradigm, a framework, for making significant meaningful change. He took on the mammoth task of leaving his home, culture, land, family and roots, and put his trust in G-d. (Genesis 12:1) He was willing to risk and to do; he was willing to begin and to take that first step.

Once that first step is taken, we must confront what unfolds and deal with all the implications. May we find the courage to search our hearts, determine what changes we want or need to make in our lives, and then, make that hard first move, as Abraham did thousands of years ago.

Kobe synagogue lifts spirits of transients far from home

By SHANA HABERMAN
Special to The CJN

"In all their long history, the Jewish people have done scarcely anything more wonderful than to create the synagogue. No human institution has a longer continuous history, and none has done more for the uplifting of the human race."
Robert T. Herford, Christian scholar

I boarded the train for Kobe early that morning, the first day of Rosh Hashanah, with some trepidation. My curiosity about what awaited me in Kobe was mingled with a tinge of sadness and melancholy. For the first time in my life, I would be separated from my family for the High Holy Days, a special time that over the years, I had come to associate with the wonderful smells of my mother's freshly baked challah, the warm sounds of Shanah Tovah greetings extended by relatives as they entered our home for lunch following services, and the sweet taste of apples dipped in honey.

Naturally, these were anxieties I had struggled with prior to my departure to teach English in Japan for a year. I knew that celebrating Jewish holidays in the absence of family and loved ones would be especially difficult, but these concerns seemed almost petty in light of the cultural experience I knew awaited me in Japan.

After some investigation, I learned there were two active synagogues in Japan, one in Tokyo and the other in Kobe. Eager to get a firsthand taste of what has traditionally been considered a cultural centre of Japan, and attracted to its smaller-sized congregation, I decided to spend the High Holy Days at Ohel Shelomo Synagogue in Kobe.

As soon as I entered the synagogue (admittedly only after stumbling into a Buddhist temple that I mistook for the shul), I knew that I had made the right choice. The shul appealed to me immediately with its small size, its warm decor and its overall heimishe feel. Entering its doors was for me like entering a whole other world, far removed from the foreign and sometimes bewildering world of Japan.

Seated in the women's section, I couldn't help but notice the highly eclectic mixture of people around me. Although the service was conducted in the Orthodox Sephardi tradition (a foreign combination for a Conservative Ashkenazi like myself), the congregants themselves appeared to be neither Orthodox nor Sephardi. This observation, coupled with my curiosity about the names on the synagogue's memorial tablet, prompted me to inquire about the origins of the shul and ultimately to learn about the rich history of Ohel Shelomo.

Beginning in the early 1930s and continuing into the early 1940s, Kobe was a processing centre for Jewish refugees arriving from China, Russia and the Middle East. Although it was merely a transit point for most as they were en route to North America, many chose to make Kobe their permanent home. They viewed Japan as a safe haven where they could enjoy freedom of religion – a welcome change from the religious intolerance and persecution they had encountered in their home countries.

In 1931, a congregation and Jewish community was started at Kitaoka House in the Yamamoto Dori district of Kobe, to meet the needs of the growing Jewish community. By 1939, the congregation was predominantly Sephardi and the synagogue moved to a new location. Yet another space was rented by early 1941 to accommodate the onslaught of new Ashkenazi refugees arriving from Eastern Europe. Thus, a Sephardi and an Ashkenazi congregation coexisted in Kobe for some time.

Just before the outbreak of World War II, Rahmo Sassoon, a Syrian Jew, emigrated to Japan. Shortly after his arrival, he purchased a plot of land for his business. The warehouse built on this land soon came to be used for social activities such as card clubs, and then as a place of worship. The Jews of Kobe gradually began to make donations, but as Victor Kelly, who came to Kobe from Burma in 1935 and still resides in the Japanese city, recalls, "There was no real purpose for these donations."

In 1960, Rahmo Sassoon sold this plot of land to his brother Edmund. Recognizing that the time had come to build a proper edifice to house a synagogue, the leaders of Kobe's Jewish community decided that Sassoon's plot of land would be the ideal location. They raised 10 million yen, but were still short of the 23 million yen sought by its owner. In addition, the community was divided in its opinions about the building of a new synagogue. Many lamented that there simply were not enough funds within the community to sustain such an ambitious project.

Undeterred by the doubters and determined to see his vision of a self-contained synagogue in Kobe realized, Kelly instructed Edmund Sassoon to draw up a contract for the sale of his land. He remembers saying to a then highly skeptical founding president, Jack Gotlieb: "Sign the document, we'll find the money." When asked where the money could be found, Kelly raised his hands to heaven and responded: "With G-d." And so began a campaign spearheaded by founding chair Kelly to build Ohel Shelomo Synagogue.

Once the land was paid off, a fundraising campaign began for the building of the synagogue. Private donations and promissory notes were the main sources of funds raised in the campaign, with social events like Purim parties supplementing that revenue. As an added incentive, Kelly promised seats in the synagogue to the major donors, encouraging people to give for the community and "in the name of G-d." By 1970, the fundraising campaign had achieved its goal, raising an impressive 30 million yen.

The opening ceremony for Ohel Shelomo Synagogue took place on March 10, 1970, and Kelly proudly recalls that Japanese priests, government officials and dignitaries participated to mark the occasion. At that time, the building housed not only a synagogue, but also a Hebrew school. Rather than pay the salary for a full-time rabbi and/or cantor, the congregants took it upon themselves to oversee the daily running and organization of the shul. In 1971, the shul was registered with the local Japanese government and the Jewish community of Kobe gained "official" status.

At that time, the Jewish community of Kobe had approximately 150 families. Sadly, this number has now been reduced to five or six families. Most of the older generation of Kobe Jews have died. Some members of the community, who had no surviving family members in Japan, have scattered to other areas of the world. Hence, Ohel Shelomo's congregation is now predominantly comprised of transients – people like myself who come for the High Holy Days or the occasional Shabbat service from surrounding areas like Kyoto and Osaka.

Shana Haberman with new friends at Kobe synagogue.

This leaves the future of Ohel Shelomo Synagogue in a rather precarious state. Transients do not play an active role in the daily running and management of the shul and funding through private donations is limited.

Moreover, the synagogue must now raise 18 million yen ($210,000) to repair the damage wrought by the Great Hanshin eathquake of 1995. Despite what may appear to be an insurmountable challenge, Kelly expressed confidence in the continued support of Kobe's Jewish community.

"There will always be some people who have a vested interest in the continued existence of this shul," Kelly said, "whether it be a wealthy businessman in Tokyo whose grandfather was a founding member or a traveller like yourself just passing through."

After the conclusion of the service on that first day of Rosh Hashanah, my fears of returning home with an empty stomach and a heavy heart were quickly allayed by the tantalizing sight of a lunch buffet to be served at the shul. The meal offered the perfect opportunity to satisfy my curiosity regarding the eclectic crowd I had surveyed during the service. And "transients" they certainly were – exchange students at a Japanese university for the semester, English teachers working in Japan for the year, a visiting rabbi and his wife from Brooklyn and young Israeli jewelry vendors taking advantage of the financial benefits of temporarily working in Japan, among others.

I, for one, enjoyed this festive meal in a truly unique way. There is something about being so many thousands of miles from home and all that is familiar, and yet still feeling a sense of belonging and community that simply cannot be adequately expressed in words – not to mention the taste of lokshen kugel, carrot tzimmes, challah, apples and honey and other traditional Rosh Hashanah fare. Indeed, I was so deeply moved by the experience that I found myself at a loss for words when I tried to express my heartfelt gratitude to the chef, an Israeli expatriot living in Kobe, who had prepared the meal with his wife.

The sound of the shofar, blown by Rahmo Sassoon's nephew, sent a shiver up my spine, and many emotions ran through me. It seemed as though the sounds of that shofar echoed the history of the Jewish community of Kobe and Ohel Shelomo Synagogue, and indeed, symbolized the unity of Jews all over the world. I couldn't help but think of how proudly Sassoon must be looking down on his nephew who travelled from Tokyo with his family to spend the holidays at Ohel Shelomo.

And this in turn triggered thoughts of my own grandfather who had been a cantor in various shuls throughout Hungary and would surely have appreciated seeing his granddaughter in a shul with such a rich history in such a far away land. With the sound of that shofar, I finally understood why many have suggested that the synagogue has been and still is the most potent institution for Jewish continuity throughout our history.

I left Kobe with the comforting knowledge that the following week, when I boarded the train to Sannomiya Station in Kobe for Yom Kippur, I would not do so half-heartedly. I would miss my family back home in Canada as much as ever, but could now look forward to returning to the welcoming doors of Ohel Shelomo Synagogue, a unique place of worship for Jews in Japan.

Lebanon: Israel's Vietnam?

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Earlier this month, Hassan Nasrallah, leader of Hezbollah, described Lebanon as "Israel's Vietnam," where it would ultimately be defeated. The recent debate in Israel over its presence in southern Lebanon has indeed sounded at times like the debate over the U.S. involvement in Vietnam some 30 years ago. For those voices that are now calling for consideration of a unilateral withdrawal, remaining in Lebanon is viewed as simply asking for more casualties without achieving any significant military or political gains.

But there are significant differences with the American experience. Vietnam was far from home, and the point of being there was lost on more and more Americans as the years dragged on and the toll in human lives grew. Lebanon is on Israel's borders, and the stated purpose of being there is to guarantee the safety of Israel's northern settlements. Some argue, in turn, that the north can be protected from within Israel's borders.

The story of Israel in Lebanon is replete with ironies. In 1982, Operation Peace for Galilee was undertaken ostensibly to assure the security of the northern settlements, but it quickly became apparent that Ariel Sharon's grand design was to push northward in Lebanon to destroy the PLO infrastructure. This strategy failed, and the first serious, Israeli public outcry against a war finally led to the withdrawal of Israeli troops in 1985. The IDF remained in southern Lebanon, in a security strip policed by the pro-Israel, largely Christian, Southern Lebanese Army. While this created a buffer zone free of the PLO for Israel's north, it provided the conditions for the growth of Hezbollah, financed by Iran and encouraged by Syria, Lebanon's patron. Hezbollah was virtually inconsequential until the IDF established the security zone.

In this war of attrition, the gruesome measure of success is the balance of casualties. Israeli military experts take comfort in a clinical balance of 3:1 in Israel's favor — three Hezbollah killed for every Israeli death. But the bitter truth in fighting against guerrilla forces of this nature is a different one. The victor is not the side that can kill more, but rather the side that can tolerate more casualties...And Israel's threshold of tolerance is much lower than that of the Hezbollah.

The Israeli psyche does not cope well with protracted wars of attrition. Israelis are capable of harnessing powerful psychological resources against adversity — for concentrated periods of time. Indeed, the Israeli attack on the Egyptian and Syrian air forces, which launched the 1967 Six Day War, was undertaken precisely because the month-long Arab siege of Israel through the troop concentrations on its borders had become psychologically and emotionally unbearable. The 1971-73 War of Attrition, four short years later, saw the emergence of unprecedented, vitriolic, political and social satire in response to the unrelenting reports of casualties. Today, the front-page photos of young casualties every few days are painfully reminiscent of the bloody toll during those difficult three years preceding the Yom Kippur War. Later, in 1989, the constant pressure of the Palestinian intifadah, which had broken out three years earlier, brought the Israeli government to the negotiating table with the Palestinians.

Today, the public challenge to the IDF presence in Lebanon is led by mothers of soldiers. They are joined by a small, but influential group of politicians and ex-military officers, who are exploring a range of creative options that might further Israel's security goals while withdrawing troops to the Israeli side of the international border. While the majority of Israelis remain supportive of the IDF presence there, even within the government there is an acknowledgment that alternatives must be explored. Overshadowing this grim reality is the Syrian question.

Last month, the horror and grief over the terrorist attack on Jerusalem's Ben-Yehuda Street mingled with the pain and shock of the failed commando raid by Israel's Navy Seals in Lebanon. For a few days, the country was numb with the shock of failure, anger and frustration, and the distinction between the two challenges was temporarily blurred. As the routine resumed, the two issues became separate again. The difference is clear. In Lebanon, Israel has no territorial claim. The issue is strictly the security of its northern border, and any Israeli leader will be prepared to consider withdrawal once this is assured. It is simple compared to the complexity of the relationship with the Palestinian Authority and the questions surrounding negotiations on the future of the West Bank.

A New Year's resolution

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Significant occasions and events may cause us to contemplate our lifestyle and sometimes move us to make significant changes. This article is meant to encourage you to do just that, in celebrating the arrival of the year 5758.

From time to time, I have called attention to a little literary magazine entitled Ariel, which calls itself Israel Review of Arts and Literature and is published four times a year in Jerusalem. Here is something from the current issue that I would like to share with you.

Most of this issue is given to Hebrew as a language and as a means of broadening one's insight into being Jewish. I know that many readers of this column have long wondered what Hebrew can do for them and have played with the idea of taking a course. I hope to firm up that potential resolve by providing you with some excerpts from two articles in the issue.

"The stereotypical image of Hebrew as a language of ritual, prayer and Sunday School is totally wrong. It deprives us of an appreciation of the immense debt western civilization owes to the Hebrew language, which is on a par with Greek and Latin. During the Renaissance, Christian scholars took a profound interest in the Old Testament and produced new translations directly from the original Hebrew, rather than using the Vulgate Latin texts. This interest can be seen, for example, in the poetry of William Blake and John Milton (who read and wrote Hebrew fluently) and in Rembrandt's famous painting Writing on the Wall. The Round Tower in Copenhagen is engraved with the Latin word Doctrinament, and a sword, heart, and God's name (the four Hebrew letters of the Tetragrammaton) indicating that the doctrine of the Protestant monarch was to let his heart be ruled by God's word."

"Knowledge of Hebrew provides direct access to the Bible, over 3,000 years of cultural creativity, a better understanding of the development of English and even a possible key to comparative linguistics, an appreciation of the biblical in modern literature, cinema, song, art, oratory and politics, and an insight into the moral, ethical, religious and judicial foundations of what we know today as Western Civilization.

"Last, but by no means least, Hebrew is the language of modern Israel and an indispensable key to understanding and appreciating Israel and its culture. Although in the Israeli linguistic marketplace, English will undoubtedly continue to enjoy immense prestige, the day is not far off – sometime in the 21st century – when a majority of the Jewish people in the world will be Hebrew-speaking Israelis. For Jews in the Diaspora, Hebrew remains important as part of their religious heritage, but increasingly it will also function as a window to Israel, and a key to their own cultural heritage."

Another article I found most fascinating in this issue of Ariel dealt with Eliezer Ben Yehuda, who single-handedly created modern Hebrew — which is a tale that everyone should know.

Shanah Tovah and happy learning!

Religious stock-taking for 5758

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are one of the few times a year when Jews of all persuasions can feel united. About 70 to 80 percent of Canadian Jews are likely to be in a synagogue or temple. In Canada, 77 percent of Jews claim they fast on Yom Kippur (in the United States the figure is only 64 percent.

Even secularists recognize the centrality of the High Holidays. The Workmen's Circle in New York is running ads for a "Cultural Rosh Hashanah Celebration" to be held Sunday morning, Sept. 28. It will feature "stories, activities, Yiddish folk songs and traditional holiday foods.

Judaism in North America continues to show signs of life despite gloomy demographic projections. A recent issue of The Forward reported on the emergence of Jewish life in Woodstock, in rural Vermont. Fifty years ago, only one Jewish family lived in the then "anti-Semitic" hamlet. In late September, the now 40 Jewish families were to parade through the streets with a new Torah for the congregation. At nearby Dartmouth College, not a single Jew was on faculty 50 years ago. Today, not only are 20 percent of the faculty and 10 percent of the student body Jews, but a new $2.6 million Roth Centre for Jewish life has been built.

Meanwhile in New York, a new program of the 92nd Street Y, Derech Torah, provides stimulating, text-based, adult Jewish education classes to many Jews who are either intermarried or far removed from synagogue life. The Forward reports that 1,500 people have already finished the 30-week course, and that it will be replicated in other American cities.

This process of reintroducing non-observant Jews to the joys of Jewish text and Jewish learning is also taking place in Israel. In a recent Montreal lecture, Rabbi David Hartman, charismatic Orthodox philosopher and educator, described efforts of the pluralistic Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem. One program has enrolled 30 principals of non-religious schools in Israel for four years of text-based study, with even more registered for the coming year. The aim of the program is to foster a greater appreciation of Judaic religious thought in the Israeli general school system. Apparently dozens of study groups have sprung up in Israel, involving secular Jews in the study of classical Judaic sources.

Alas, there is a big difference in the Israeli and North American environments. There is no opposition to the North American programs, from any element on the Jewish spectrum. There is no downside. But the gulf between the religious and the non-religious is much deeper and more bitter in Israel.

In his Montreal address, Rabbi Hartman also outlined clearly his vision for the future status of religion in Israel. He advocated that Israel become a secular state, that the positions of chief rabbis be abolished, and that all Judaic denominations be recognized and allowed to compete. In short, he called for a complete rupture between church and state! This is anathema, obviously, to almost all of the segments of dati opinion in Israel.

Efforts by Rabbi Hartman and others to build bridges between the Orthodox and the non-Orthodox are likely seen as tainted or suspect by extreme elements in Israeli Orthodoxy. The growing haredi community has little use for such efforts, if they are seen as an opening wedge of religious pluralism. In theory, Rabbi Hartman is on the right track. In practice, there would be some difficulties in implementing his vision, notably in the area of immigration. The Law of Return would clearly violate the principles of a truly liberal democratic and secular state. But he may be right that Judaism could flourish in Israel by removing the state-Orthodox monopoly, and encouraging pluralism.
